THE WORLD OF SNOW AND ICE
I—SNOWFLAKES

If a cloud rises extremely high in the air, millions of snowflakes may come fluttering down to the earth. Snow is not "frozen rain." It is frozen mist, or frozen water vapor.

A snowflake is a bit of vapor which has turned into an ice crystal. Usually it has six sides or points.

Of thousands of snowflakes which have been photographed, no two have been found to be exactly alike. Nature seems to delight in making new forms.

Although most snowflakes have six sides or points, it would be a mistake to say that all of them are that way. In some snowfalls the flakes are of triangle shape. The triangle-shaped flakes are formed in very high clouds when the temperature is about zero Fahrenheit.

Snowflakes differ a great deal in size. Some are so small that 15 of them side by side would measure only one inch. Others are a half-inch, or even an inch wide. The large ones are apt to fall when the air is not very cold.

Snow does not weigh nearly so much as water. Of course the weight of snow is not always the same. When the crystals are closely packed, they weigh far more than otherwise. On the average 10 bucketfuls of snow will weigh as much as one bucketful of water. Snow which has lain on the ground a long while, and which has become closely packed, will weigh about one-fourth as much as water.

As I have said before, snow falls in summer as well as in winter. Those of us who do not live on high mountains are not likely to see summer snow—unless we happen to pass through a snowstorm during an airplane journey.

Most of the summer snow melts before it touches the ground, and the result is a rain or drizzle.

In England there isn't a single mountain tall enough to have snow on its peak the year around. Many other countries, however, have peaks which are snowclad in mid-summer. The Alps, the Andes and the Rockies are only a few of the mountain ranges with such peaks.

The line around a peak which marks the lower edge of the summer snowfield is known as the "snow line" or "snow limit." This is a high line in the torrid zone and a low line in the Arctic.

In the torrid zone the snow line is more than three miles above sea level. Some of the high parts of the Andes in South America, also certain peaks in central Africa are high enough to have snow the year around.
