Toscanini to Conduct First of New Symphony Series at 8:35 Tonight

Cecil B. DeMille is now given one of a rare series of coins to each actress who turns in a noteworthy performance on the Monday night Radio Theater. First recipient of an award was Ida Lupino, shown here, for her outstanding work as Kathy in "Wuthering Heights."

Arturo Toscanini will wield the baton again tonight when the NBC Symphony orchestra opens a new series under his direction. The program will be aired starting at 8:35 p. m. through WENR and at 9:30 through WIBA, will include Mozart' "Serenade No. 2 in B Flat," Haydn's "Symphony in E Flat Major, No. 99," and Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben."

Other featured attractions for tonight follow, classified:

A LITTLE SATURDAY TALK: MORE ABOUT DRAGONS

In our story yesterday I told some things about the strange monsters known as dragons. They have had a place in stories told for thousands of years.

In legends of ancient Greece, the dragon was spoken of as a very wicked being. Among the Greek heroes who are supposed to have slain the monsters are Perseus and Hercules.

In Rome there came a time when people "took a fancy" to the dragon. Many groups of Roman soldiers carried pictures of dragons along with images of war-eagles.

The dragon was used as a standard by Saxon soldiers of early England. Later—after England was conquered by the Normans—the dragon appeared on banners and shields which English soldiers carried into battle.

Some coats-of-arms of British families are adorned with figures of dragons. When shown in this way, the dragon usually has the body of a snake with the feet of eagles, the head of a wolf, wings like those of a giant bat and a barbed tail.

England, however, has made a hero of a man who is supposed to have killed a dragon long ago. This hero is known as St. George, and he is called "the patron saint of England."

The story of St. George's life is not known clearly. It is believed that he lived about 1,600 years ago, and that he was a soldier in the army of a Roman emperor.

Here, in short modern form, is the legend printed by Caxton, a pioneer English printer:

"The people of the city of Sylene in Lybye were saddened by the presence of a dragon which demanded food each day. At first they gave two sheep each day, but later they gave their own children, chosen by lot.

"After a time the lot fell on the daughter of the king. He begged his people to let him give silver and gold instead of his daughter, but they refused, saying they would burn him and his palace if he did not stand by the rule.

"The king at last gave in and led the princess to the place where the dragon would come.

"While she was sitting there, fearful and alone, along came St. George and asked her what was the matter. When she told him, he decided to do battle against the dragon.

"The dragon came running toward them. St. George leveled his spear and rode against it. The dragon was knocked to the ground, badly wounded.

"St. George and the princess then led the dragon into the city. In the sight of the people he killed it. The body was loaded on four ox-carts, and was taken away and thrown in the fields."
