Jack London Entered High School at Age of 19

BEFORE returning from their sealing trip to Alaskan waters, Jack London and the other sailors visited Japan. For several days their vessel lay at anchor off Yokohama. Jack went ashore with the other sailors, and observed some of the strange customs of the Japanese.

After getting back to Oakland, Jack received his pay and gave nearly all of it to his family. It seemed to him that his parents needed the money more than he did.

The next year one of his sailor friends asked him to join in another voyage to Alaska aboard the "Mary Thomas." He said that he would not go because, if he sailed again, he wanted to head for the South Seas. So the "Mary Thomas" left port without him, and was never seen again. No doubt it was wrecked during a storm, with all hands lost!

In Oakland Jack found a place in a jute mill, and worked hard for small wages, 13 hours a day. Learning of a prize contest conducted by a newspaper, he set about writing an account of an adventure he had had on his Pacific voyage. He hardly slept for three nights while he wrote at top speed. To his joy, he received first prize, the sum of $25, and his story called "Typhoon Off the Coast of Japan," was printed in the "San Francisco Call."

At about the time he was 18, young London became what he described as "a tramp." Working only now and then along the way, he made his way to Washington, New York and Boston. Then he returned to his native state.

Late in his teens London lived the life of a tramp.

That much tramping seemed enough. He felt that, if he were not careful, his life would prove useless. In this frame of mind, he decided to go back to school, and at the age of 19 became a high school freshman.

Jack's father lately had met with better fortune. He had become a policeman, and was able to provide food and shelter while the youth studied.

Finishing high school within two years, Jack went on to the University of California and spent a year in earnest study. He took as many English courses as possible. In other times, he might have kept on with university work until he graduated, but the Klondike gold rush started in 1897, and he joined it.
