Herodotus Told About Egypt's Sacrifice of Bulls

LET US listen once more to the words of Herodotus about ancient Egypt. The great traveler read what he had written down and held the interest of large crowds on the streets of Athens almost 24 centuries ago.

"No other country," he said, "has so many wonders as Egypt. The climate is different from that of the rest of the world, and the customs of the people are different.

"The women of Egypt go out to the markets while the men stay home working at the loom. People in general eat their food outdoors.

"An Egyptian woman cannot serve in any priestly office. The men are priests for both the gods and the goddesses. The sons in a family do not have to support their parents unless they wish to do so. The daughters, on the other hand, must work for their parents in all cases.

"In other countries, priests have long hair, but in Egypt their heads are shaved. The Egyptians wear no hair at any time except when they mourn the death of a relative. Then they let their beards and the hair of their heads grow long.

"The Egyptians spend too much on religion. They drink from brass cups, which they wash every day. They wear clothing made from linen cloth, and always keep it clean.

"The priests bathe twice a day, and twice at night. They have no expense for anything. Bread is baked for them from holy grain, and each one is given plenty of beef and goose flesh.

Cattle were important in farm work carried on in ancient Egypt.

"The priests sacrifice a bull which does not have a single black hair. They cut off its head and heap curses on the head. Then they sell it to a Greek trader, or throw it in the river. They pray that any evil may fall on that head, not on the heads of the Egyptians. They will never eat the head of any animal.

"When they sacrifice in honor of the goddess Isis, they burn the bull's body, except for the legs, Shoulders and some other parts. The latter are set aside to be eaten.

"Cows are never burned at such a time, since they are sacred to Isis. The statue of this goddess has the form of a woman but the horns of a cow.

"When a cow dies, it is thrown into the river. A bull, on the other hand, is buried in a suburb, with one or both of its horns above the surface of the ground to mark the place."
