Hide-Seek Game Causes Boys' Death

CHICAGO — (U.P.) — Leroy Barton, 6, died of suffocation in an old fashioned ice box no longer used for refrigeration, and police believed today that his little dog had caused his death in a game of hide and seek.

Leroy's widowed mother, a nightclub waitress, told police the child often played hide and seek with "Baby," his six-month-old mongrel pup, and that he frequently hid in the refrigerator.

Leroy's body was found Sunday night by roomers in the Barton home. The child had stripped off his clothing, apparently while trying to get air.

Police believed the puppy had brushed against the fastener on the regrigerator door, clicking it shut.

TEAR-MAKING ONIONS ARE RELATIVES OF LILIES

The French language gave us our word "onion," but the French got their word from Italy. The old Latin name used in Italy for this vegetable had the meaning of "pearl."

If we take an onion apart, we can see a reason for it to be compared to a pearl. The parts under the outer coating have coloring something like that of a pearl.

Onions are related to the flowers known as lilies. Yes, they are in the lily family, but they have a different smell!

The sharp odor of the onion comes from an oil in the bulb. When this oil is exposed to the air, much of it will turn into a vapor. If there is a good deal of the vapor, it is likely to make a person's eyes water, and that is one way to "cry" without having felt sad in the first place.

When onions are cooked, they lose most of their odor. Boiled onions are easy to digest, and the person who eats them need have little fear that his breath will carry a strong message.

Yet raw onions have their place. They have some health-giving values not present in those which are cooked. If members of a family are worried about "onions on the breath," they can stay home that evening. If everyone in the family eats raw onions ('tis said) no one will notice them—unless an unexpected visitor turns up.

Onions have been grown in gardens for more than 4,000 years. The ancient Egyptians raised them, and so did the Greeks and Romans.

Besides the common white onions, there are "red" and "yellow" onions. Red onions have a very strong, sharp taste but tests have shown that while the bulbs are in the ground they are better able to resist mildew and "neck rot."

Spanish onions are popular because they are mild. Other important kinds are the Bermuda and Portuguese.

Onions which are picked while young are milder than those left in the ground to reach full size. The latter, however, have special value because they can be stored and used months later.

Many gardeners use "onion sets" instead of seeds. In other words they buy very young plants which have been grown by others from seeds.

It is remarkable how far onion seeds will go. With one pound of seeds, you may obtain four tons of onions—but perhaps you won't need that many of them!
