INCA INDIANS RAISED WHITE POTATOES WHEN SPANIARDS CAME

THE TURKEY is not a native bird of Turkey, and the Irish potato is not a native plant of Ireland.

The white potato, as we may better call it, was first found in South America. The Inca Indians were raising it when the Spaniards first entered Peru.

About four centuries ago, potatoes were taken to Spain. Later they were grown in the Netherlands, France and Italy.

The exact date when white potatoes were first planted in the British Isles is not known, but both Sir John Hawkins and Sir Francis Drake have been given credit for taking them back home from the New World.

One record says that potatoes obtained by Drake in the West Indies were planted in Ireland in 1586. This record, however, may refer to the sweet potato, which belongs to a different family than the white.

In any case the white potato was planted in Ireland at an early date, and it became important there. When other crops failed, potatoes usually grew well enough, and that saved the Irish from famine more than once. The time came when they depended on white potatoes more than on any other crop.

The white potato is said to have been planted in North America for the first time in 1719 by Scotch-Irish settlers in New Hampshire. If that is true, the South American vegetable traveled both ways across the Atlantic before reaching out continent!
