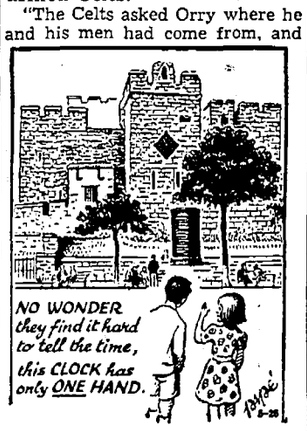
Most Manx Folk Have Vikings Among Ancestors

THERE is a story about the Isle of Man which runs like this:

"About the year 900, there came to Man a band of Vikings under the lead of a man named Orry. Hardly had they touched the beach when they were met by a company of armed Celts.

"The Celts asked Orry where he and his men had come from, and he pointed toward the North Star. Thinking that this meant that the invaders had come from heaven, the Celts fell on their knees and accepted Orry as their king."



An old castle on the Isle of Man contains a one-handed clock presented by Queen Elizabeth 350 years ago.

That legend probably was invented to explain a change in the history of the Isle of Man. A Norse leader called "Orry" or "Gorree" did become the king, but very likely there was some fighting before he won the throne.

The Vikings, or Norsemen, stayed on the island, and many of them married native women. From time to time a new boatload arrived, and most of the blue-eyed, fair-haired Manx folk today have Norsemen, as well as Celts, among their ancestors.

Set almost at the center of the Irish sea, the Isle of Man is 33 miles long and 12 miles wide. The area is 227 square miles. Near the southern end is a tiny island known as "the Calf of Man."

The population has not changed much during the past century. In 1821 the number of people living there was 40,081. Today the figure is about 50,000.

Most of the people make their living by farming, fishing or working in the lead and zinc mines. Another occupation is taking care of visitors. The Isle of Man is a center for tourists in time of peace.

For several centuries, the king of Norway claimed that the Isle of Man was a part of his empire, but in 1266 he made a treaty turning it over to Scotland. The Scots held control for only about 20 years before the rule was turned over to England.

English nobles have ruled the island most of the time since then. In 1829 the British government bought out the last of the rights of the ruling family, having paid a total of more than $2,400,000 to bring an end to the rule of the nobles. Since 1866 the Manx people have enjoyed "home rule," although united to Great Britain.
