Cougar Guards Young Against Attacks by Mate

CATS with a weight of from 175 to 200 pounds live on the western side of North America, from British Columbia down into Mexico. They are known as "cougars" or "pumas." They also have the name of "mountain lions," but they are not true lions.

A cougar is a strong, fierce bundle of flesh. It seldom attacks human beings, but can do a great deal of damage if it does fight a man.

A Cougar with cubs or "kittens".

Cases are on record where a cougar has followed a man for some distance, but has run away when the man suddenly turned around and faced it.

Sheep suffer from cougar attacks, as do also calves and colts. The animals make their raids at night, and in the morning a rancher may find dozens of his livestock dead.

Cougars are expert tree-climbers, but they track on the ground. With silent tread, they come from behind and leap on their victims.

The cougar is not quite so large or strong as the jaguar, another member of the cat tribe on this continent. Yet cougars often prove faster with claws and teeth, and win some of the fights they have with jaguars.

The female is likely to choose a pile of loose rock, with an opening through which she can crawl, as her home. Here she takes care of her young.

The male does not live in the same home. He seems to be jealous of the "kittens," and has been known to kill them when they wandered a short distance from the mother's side.

Several men watched a fight between a mother cougar and a black bear. The bear happened to pass near the cougar den, probably meaning no harm to the young.

Out sprang the mother cougar, and landed on the bear's back. The bear tried to shake her off, but without success. Then he reared and rolled over on the ground, and the cougar was forced to let go her hold.

The cougar now flew at the bear's throat, and on his part the bear wrapped his limbs around her in the well-known "bear hug." A few moments later, holding tightly to each other, they fell over the edge of a cliff. The men later found them, both dead, at the bottom of the nearby gulch.
