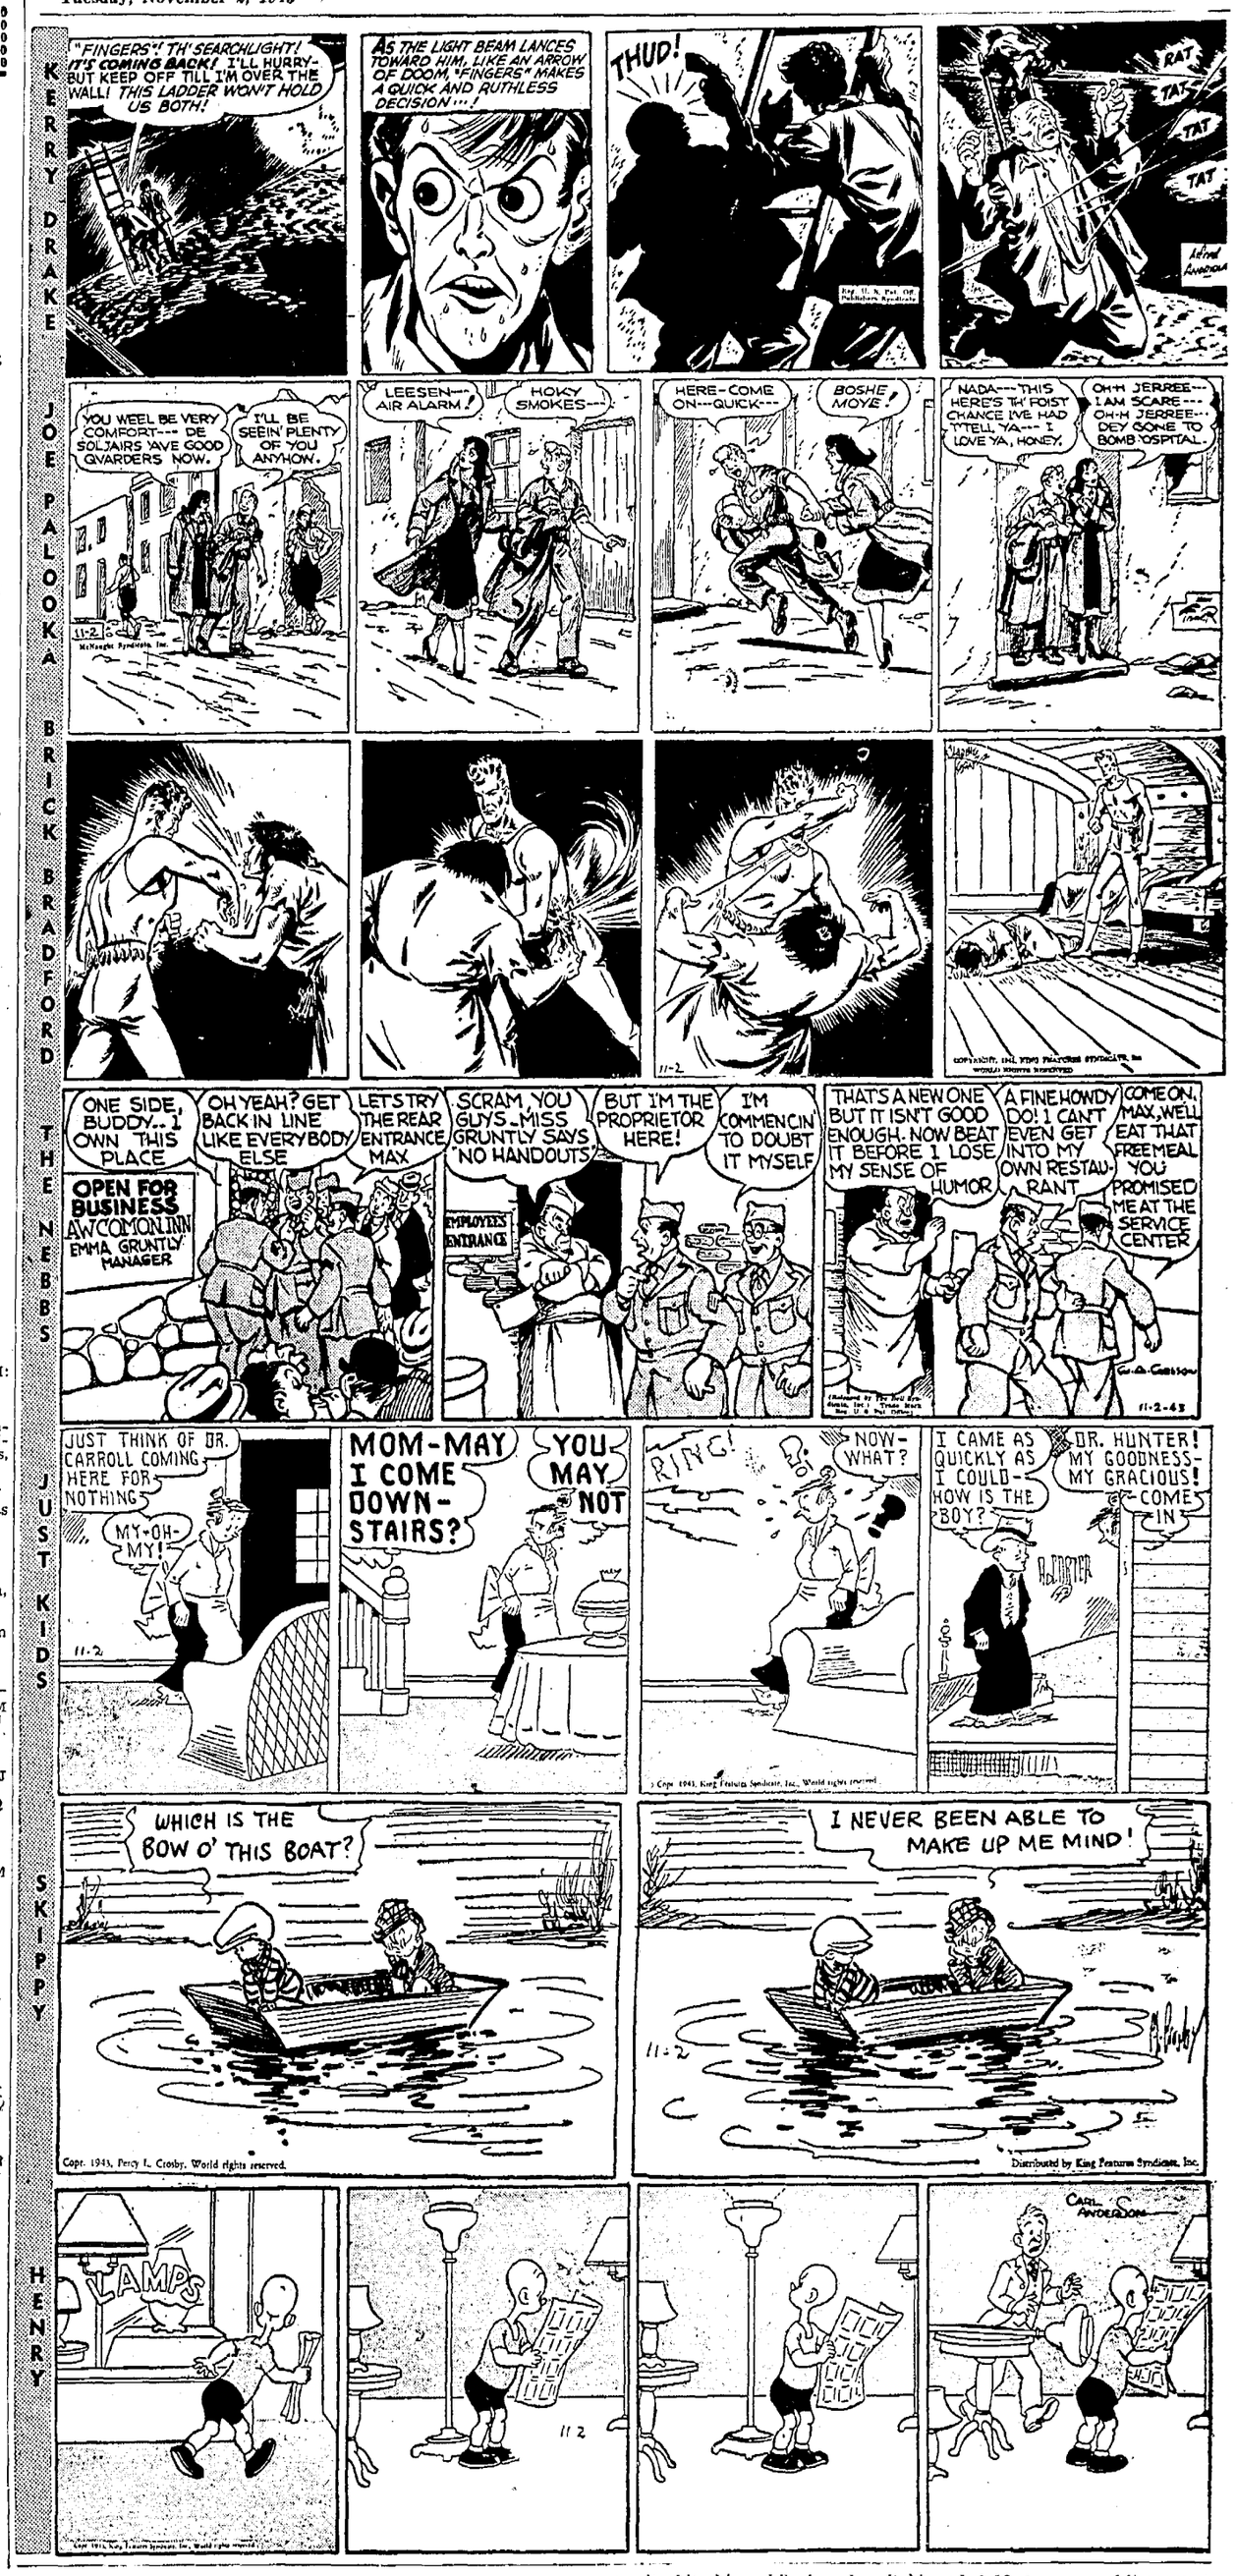
SCOTT'S SCRAP BOOK — By R. J. Scott



Uncle Ray's Corner

Tests Proved Stegomyia Mosquito Guilty of Spreading Fever

WHEN Dr. Gorgas talked about yellow fever with his friend, Dr. Finlay, he said: "You tell me that yellow fever is spread by Stegomyia mosquitoes, but how do you know that? Have you ever made a test which showed that a person would come down with the fever after being bitten by a mosquito?"

Finlay said that he had made tests, but that the people bitten had not become ill. In some cases he had let the mosquitoes bite yellow fever patients before biting well persons, but no harm had followed. Yet Finlay said that other reasons made him feel sure that mosquitoes spread the disease.

Gorgas said Finlay's idea was interesting but was without proof. That proof came later.

Two doctors in Havana fell sick with yellow fever and both of them said they had been bitten beforehand by mosquitoes. Dr. Jesse Lazear had watched a mosquito bite him while in a hospital where yellow fever patients were kept.

DR. WILLIAM C. GORGAS

Lazear died of the fever, but before he passed away he said he was sure the mosquito which had bitten him was of the Stegomyia breed. That was the same kind Finlay had accused of spreading the disease.

Another doctor, Walter Reed of Virginia, now made very careful tests. These tests proved beyond doubt that the Stegomyia mosquito could spread yellow fever. It was necessary, however, for the biting to take place during the first three days a patient was ill, or else later bites would not harm other persons. Also the mosquito needed 10 days, or a bit more, to develop yellow fever germs in its own body.

Quickly Gorgas set to work. This time he made war on mosquitoes and their breeding places. Mud puddles were dried up, and soldiers were sent to every house in Havana. Barrels with rain water were covered with screens or netting. People no longer were allowed to keep open jars of water about their homes.

In that way Havana was really cleaned up, and the yellow fever epidemic was brought to an end.
