U. S. Proves Value of Environment, Say Scientists

CHICAGO—(U.P.)—The American tradition that man is a creature of environment "without any birthrights" has scored a scientific triumph over the European attitude that heredity determines his personality and fate, Dr. Franz Alexander, noted psychiatrist, declared recently.

Speaking at the University of Chicago 50th anniversary symposium, Dr. Alexander credited American scientists with loosing the stranglehold the hereditary point of view had on the social and biological sciences in the 19th century.

"The most radical blow against this point of view," he said, "was contained in the tenet of the American constitution—'all men are created equal'."

Dr. Alexander said that Sigmund Freud and other psychiatrists influenced by the European aristocratic social structure, in which a person's social status was determined by his birth, had failed to recognize the importance of the environmental factor.

"Freud erred in being too much of a biologist and not enough of a social scientist," he said.

"From the new point of view," Dr. Alexander asserted, "all men have the same opportunities and the race of life starts without any birthrights. Its scientific expression is the belief that man's fate is determined after his birth and not before.

"How could any other theory survive in a culture in which the supreme ideal was the man who achieves everything by his own efforts, and who owes everything to himself?" he asked.

Dr. Alexander pointed out that Freud's theory that the personality of the European and the American of the nineteenth century was the "universal human nature" failed to deal with the "special edition of human nature, one among an unlimited number of possibilities."

Dr. Margaret Mead, anthropologist and assistant curator of the ethnology section of the American Museum of Natural History in Washington, told the symposium that environmental factors today made the world a confusing place for the modern infant.

Dr. Mead said the baby cannot receive an impression of "wholeness and coherence from his social environment" in a situation where the mother rocks the cradle to a radio tune while the grandmother watches and listens and draws a different meaning from the scene. "That difference is communicated to the baby in their arms."

In such a situation, she said, the child can have no cultural symbols in song or painting or literature, and to gain expression "will have to make them up himself and only his age mates will understand them."

She warned against the Freudian concept that a few dramatic incidents such as weaning and initiation into new activities molded a child's character.

"If this assumption is made," she said, "then we get recommendations to pediatricians, nursery school teachers, and educators all up the line which assume that dramatic modifications of a few methods of habit training or punishment will be sufficient to produce a desirable, as against an undesirable character structure."
