Reader, Age 91, Makes Greek Style Water Clock

THERE are people in this world who keep the spirit of youth, no matter how many years pass by. Take, for instance, Mr. John F. Wing, age 91. He has written to tell me that with his own hands he has built a Greek style "water clock."

"It was made from your description of a water clock," he says, "and it works. It does not keep perfect time because, I think, of changes in the air and temperature, but it works very well. I have found that it will work best when fine oil is used instead of water."

Two or three years have passed since I wrote about the clock which has the Greek name of "clepsydra." When I told about it, I had no idea that anyone would try to make one. I am pleased that this reader was able to figure out the way to make it from what I said.

With his letter, Mr. Wing sent a sketch of the clock as it looked when finished, also a diagram to show the "works." Water drips from a tank into a jar. As the jar slowly fills, a float inside it rises toward the top.

A strong thread passes from the float up to a spool. After being wrapped around the spool just once the thread goes a short distance over a peg. A small weight is fastened to the end of the thread which hangs over the peg. As the float slowly rises in the water, or oil, the movement of the spool makes a hand turn slowly. The hand passes by the numbers of the hours, and in that way tells time.

There is no "minute hand" on a clock of this kind. When the Greeks used it, they had to estimate the minutes by the position of the hand between the hours.

It is no wonder if such a clock does not keep perfect time. People of long ago had trouble when they used water clocks! It was hard to make a standard rate for the dripping of the water. A clock which had a fast drip might be an hour or two ahead of some other clock. Think of how many persons must have been kept waiting in those days!

Mr. Wing also tells of seeing a great comet in the northern sky when he was a small boy. Possibly he is thinking of Donati's comet, which appeared in 1858, when he was six years old. Another fine comet, the Great Comet of 1861, appeared when he was nine years of age.
