Fear of Lepers Helped Bring Hospitals to Old Europe

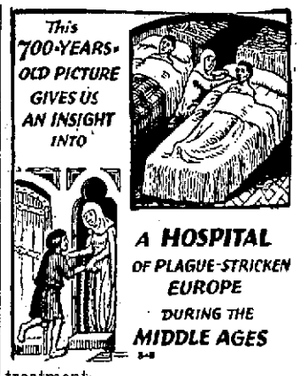
Sick persons may be glad that things are not the same as they were in Europe during the Middle Ages!

A thousand years ago, you would have had trouble finding a good doctor, a good nurse or a good hospital. The same is true about the time of Columbus, when the Middle Ages were drawing to a close.

The early history of the hospital is not very clear. It seems that the Romans used "temples of Saturn" as places for the sick, but little was done to cure the persons who went to them.

There is a record that a certain Lady Fabiola started a hospital in the year 380, and this has been called "the first hospital in Europe." The statement, however, does not take into account the temples of Saturn, which were hospitals of a sort.

Lady Fabiola was a Roman of the wealthy class who had adopted the Christian faith. She felt that there should be a central place to which sick persons could go for treatment.



In later centuries, quite a number of hospitals sprang up in Europe. Most of them were in large cities, and often they were used as hotels as well as for hospital treatment. In general they were crowded. When sheets were used on the beds, they were not changed very often.

Worry about "lepers" helped to bring about a system of hospitals. Men and women who had the disease of leprosy were not welcome in the homes of other people. Some place had to be found for them.

A French king said that the best thing to do with lepers would be to get them all together and burn them up.

That cruel idea was not followed, but laws were made to keep lepers from mixing with the general public. They were forced to wear hoods and to carry bells to give warning that they were coming near — giving others enough time to get out of the way.

In Great Britain, 200 "lazar houses," or hospitals for lepers, were opened. The problem must have been even greater in France, since we are told that the French had more than 2,000 of such hospitals.
