Alexander's Soldiers Took Home News About Cameo Stone

In Asia Minor there used to be a city called Chalcedon, and to became well known because a certain type of stone was found around it. The stone had thin layers of different colors or shades, and was given the name of "Chalcedony," in honor of the city of Chalcedon.

The same name is used to this day, but several kinds of chalcedony have special names. Among these are onyx and agate.

The Greeks knew little about such stone until after the time of Alexander the Great. That noted general invaded Asia Minor, and died while he was away from his native land. Many of his soldiers, however, returned to Macedonia and Greece and told about things they had seen.

From that time onward, this stone was mined and taken to Greece. The Greeks used it to make cameos.

Cameos are gems with "raised figures" carved on them. True cameos of ancient times were cut from onyx, agate or sardonyx.

Romans, as well as Greeks, took an interest in cameo cutting. They made figures of many kinds, sometimes portraits, by cutting through layers of the stone.

One valuable cameo dates back to Nero, a Roman emperor. It is five inches wide and six inches high, and bears images of a man and a woman. These images are believed to be portraits of Nero and his wife Agrippina.

A cameo cutter can bring out an image very well. A dark layer of onyx may serve for the outline of a man's hair. A lighter layer may show his face, and a third layer, also dark, can be used as a background. The layers may be pink, brown, red or some other shade.

With passing of time, other things besides stone have been used for making cameos. These include shells with layers which remind us of onyx layers. We also have imitation cameos made of glass which was poured into molds while it was in a melted state.

The work of cutting fine cameos calls for skill. August Saint-Gaudens, a famous sculptor, started his career as a cameo cutter in New York City.
