INCAS HAD MYTH LIKE ONE TOLD IN JAPAN

Peru has been called "the Land of the Incas," and that is a good name. This country was the chief homeland of the ancient Incas, and most of its people today are of Inca Indian stock. Hardly one-fourth of the present population is made up of white persons.

Going back four centuries, we find the Spaniards coming to conquer the people. The invaders learned that the natives had made great progress in several fields. We are told, for example, that there were no "poor" families in the Inca empire. All had enough to eat, and could get the clothes and shelter they needed.

If the Incas had no poor families, they did have some which were rich. The wealthy people were members of the royal family and high government officers. Vast stores of treasure, chiefly gold, had been gathered for them.

The gold made the Spaniards anxious to gain power in this part of South America. They took all the golden cups, plates and other objects they could lay hands on.

Gold and silver mines were opened in Peru, and Indians were forced to work in them. Thus the Spanish treasury was filled. The officers in charge of the mines grew rich from the shares which were allowed to them.

The Incas had no gold coins, but they used gold to decorate temples, and sometimes for images of the gods. Their chief deity was the "god of the sun." A legend said that the Inca emperor was descended from the sun god. This idea is strangely like the old Japanese tale which says that Japan's emperor is descended from a sun goddess.

There are stories of great treasures which the Incas hid from the Spaniards. Thousands of dollars have been used up by gold-hunters who have looked for such treasures. Perhaps the tallest tale speaks of "a solid gold chain almost 2,000 feet long" which was cast into a certain lake. That lake has been dragged, but no trace of the chain has been found.

Hundreds of rivers have cut deep valleys in Peru's mountains. The Incas sometimes put light wooden bridges across such valleys. When there is no solid bridge, a present-day Peruvian may use a "one-man cable car." By drawing on a rope which works on a pulley, he may get from one side to the other.
