Phils Get Phelps in Pirate Deal

PITTSBURGH — (U.P.) — The Pittsburgh Pirates today announced outright sale of veteran Catcher Babe Phelps to the Philadelphia Phillies for an undisclosed sum of cash.

The transaction, club officials said, was the forerunner of a deal now in process between presidents of the two clubs.

Phelps currently is employed by an express company near Ft. George Meade, Md., and is technically on the ineligible list because he did not report to the Pirates' camp within 10 days after the opening of the season. He must apply for reinstatement if he decides to play.

GALE RANKS ABOVE STRONG WIND BUT UNDER HURRICANE

The other day a woman asked me, "How fast must the wind blow before we can say it is blowing a gale?"

Answering the question in a rough way, one might say:

"A gale is a wind which blows between 40 and 75 miles an hour. It is more than a strong wind but less than a hurricane."

For everyday usage, the 40 to 75 mile an hour limits for a gale will do very well, but a sailor or weather expert might have a more exact definition.

Almost two and a half centuries ago, a "wind scale" was drawn up by a group of men at Mannheim, a German city on the Rhine river. This was called the Mannheim scale, and was used rather widely.

Later came the "Beaufort scale," the work of Sir Francis Beaufort, a British admiral. He published it in 1806, and it later was adopted, with some changes, by the British government.

As known today, the Beaufort scale calls a gale a wind of between 38 and 55 miles an hour.

The Beaufort scale defines a "light breeze" as a wind with a speed of between two and 12 miles an hour.

A "moderate wind," by the Beaufort scale, blows between 13 and 23 miles an hour. A "strong wind" carries a force of from 24 to 37 miles per hour.

Then comes the gale, and after that the "storm" and "hurricane." A "storm" is defined as coming when the wind blows not less than 56 miles an hour nor more than 75 miles. A "hurricane" is anything above 75 miles an hour.

The Beaufort scale still is followed widely. It was used as a basis for the following wind scale issued by the United States weather bureau:

Light breeze	1 to 7 miles
Gentle breeze	8 to 12 miles
Moderate breeze	13 to 18 miles
Fresh wind	19 to 24 miles
Strong wind	25 to 38 miles
Gale	39 to 54 miles
Whole gale	55 to 75 miles
Hurricane	75 miles or over
