Manchu Empress Enjoyed Long Rule Over China

YESTERDAY we were speaking of Peking, or Peiping, which used to be the capital of China. I must tell you about a Manchu empress who had her palace there for half a century. Known as the Empress Dowager, she was the real ruler during most of her life.

The Empress Dowager came into power on the death of her husband in 1861. Her infant son was hailed as the new emperor, but she ruled in his name. The child would have taken over the government in time, but he died at the age of 15.

The Empress Dowager built a costly summer palace a few miles west of Peking. On the grounds of this palace an artificial lake was prepared for her pleasure.

In 1900, while this empress was in control, the so-called "Boxer Rebellion" took place. Soldiers of Russia, France, Great Britain, the United States and Japan marched into China. Reaching Peking, they saved hundreds of white persons who were under siege in the part of Peking known as the Tartar City.

The Empress Dowager died in 1908. Only four years later a revolution brought the Chinese republic into being and swept the Manchus from power. For a time Peking was the capital of the republic, but in 1928 the seat of government was moved to Nanking.

When that change took place, the name of Peking was changed to "Peiping." At present the city is in the hands of the Japanese.

China also has lost Nanking, Canton and most of her other large cities. Thousands of Chinese fled to the western side of China before the advance of the Japanese, and the wartime capital is Chungking.

Canals and rivers were used by many of the Chinese in their westward flight. Others put their goods in carts which were pulled by oxen. Still others pushed loaded wheelbarrows hundreds of miles.

During the past year, the tide of battle has changed somewhat in favor of the Chinese. The Japanese have lost a few of the places they held before. Perhaps the next year or two will see the Chinese again in control of their own country, with Nanking or Peking as the capital city.
