Large Roman Vessels Had Cabins with Paintings and Books

In the "dead city" of Pompeii there is a tombstone with a sketch of a sailing vessel. The stone was set up almost 2,000 years ago, about 120 years before Pompeii was buried under ashes of volcano.

The picture on that stone shows a vessel with a large "double sail" which stretches almost the length of the boat. One man is to be seen climbing the mast, and two others.

The stern of the boat rises high above the water, and is in the shape of a swan's neck and head. By this time, the custom had grown of making the stern higher than the prow.

That is only one of the pictures of Roman sailing vessels which have come down to us. We have quite a number of others along with written records of Roman sailors.

The growth of foreign commerce led Romans to build large merchant vessels. A writer named Lucian, who lived 1,800 years ago, tells about one of them which was 45 feet wide and 180 feet long. It was large enough to hold a load of 250 tons.

The Romans gained control of Egypt when Cleopatra lost her throne. Not long thereafter, they carried a large obelisk from Egypt to Italy, loading it on four of their large boats. Counting its pedestal, this obelisk had a weight of 496 tons.

Pliny, a Roman writer of that time, declared that the vessel which carried the obelisk was "the most wonderful which ever had been seen." He also said that Roman boats were painted white, yellow, green, blue, violet and purple.

Excellent sailing time was made, if we may believe the olden records. It is stated that a voyage from Sicily to Alexandria, Egypt, took only six days. That was an average of about 160 miles a day. There were from two to five banks of oars on most Roman sailing ships.

Some of the larger vessels had "deck houses," or cabins, for the captain and his friends. These were decorated inside with paintings, and also contained hand-written books, or "rolls," which could be read during the voyage.
