POOR DUTCH ARTIST FOUND A MODEL IN LOOKING GLASS

Four years after the Pilgrims started the village of Plymouth, an 18-year-old Dutch boy returned to his home in Leyden, Holland. He had been studying art in Amsterdam.

Rembrandt Harmen Van Rijn was one of the younger children in a large family. His father, a miller, was not poor, but money was far from free in the household. The youth could little afford to hire models to sit for him while he sketched or painted.

REMBRANDT

In Rembrandt's bare room there hung "an old fragment of a looking-glass," and in that glass he found a model. The model was himself! By gazing at his own image, he could have a model without cost. Again and again, he painted his portrait. The pictures which have come down to us from that period in his life differ a great deal, but this does not prove lack of skill on the part of the young artist. The expression on a person's face changes from year to year, even from day to day or from moment to moment.

During the years between 18 and 25, Rembrandt also used his parents as models. Many a time his aged mother sat for him. When he painted her, he did not skip the wrinkles which care had placed upon her face. He was not trying to make his paintings beautiful; he wanted them to be true to life.

After seven years spent in that manner at Leyden, Rembrandt went to Amsterdam to take up life as a professional artist. Living in the home of an art dealer, he at first used the dealer's sister as a model, but before long the citizens of Amsterdam began to come to him to have their portraits painted. For these portraits, he was paid.

Rembrandt lived to the age of 63. His fame grew, and at times he received good prices for his pictures, but he was in poverty at the time of his death. He left the world, however, about 500 paintings, along with many drawings and etchings. Among his most interesting paintings are those of Saskia, the young and kindly wife who brightened his life during the eight years she lived after marrying him.
