Athletes and Soldiers Wore Crowns in Ancient Times

An old picture shows a king resting in a couch or bed and on his head he wears a crown. If we could judge by this picture, this king had the habit of taking his crown to bed with him!

The truth, however, probably is different. The artist no doubt wanted everyone to know that his picture was of a king, not a common man, and a simple way to show that was to put a crown on his head.

The history of crowns goes back 2,500 years or more. At first they were worn by athletes or soldiers more than by kings.

At the Olympian Games in ancient Greece, champion runners, jumpers and so on were given crowns made from twigs and leaves of the olive tree. After his great victroy, the winner stepped forward and an official placed the olive crown on his head.

Ancient Rome honored soldiers more than athletes. A soldier who saved the life of a Roman citizen during battle was given a crown which contained oak leaves and acorns.

A Roman general whose men captured a city was crowned with a circle of flowers, or woven grass.

A small circle of gold was given to the Roman soldier who first scaled the walls of a city which was under siege. That is, the soldied got the crown if he lived through the fight.

Some Roman emperors put crowns on their heads when they went to watch fights in the arena. For a long time, however, the crown was not a sign of royal power in Rome.

Before the first Roman emperor ruled Rome, Persian kings followed the custom of wearing "diadems." These were headbands made of silk, linen or wool. A Persian ruler showed his power by wearing a headband of this kind.

Today the word "diadem" is used as another name for "crown," and it may be a very costly object made with gold and hundreds of jewels.

After the fall of the Roman empire, many kings and some queens wore metal crowns. These were of varous shapes and sizes. King James I of Great Britain wore a crown valued at $5,500 which had a weight of seven pounds and six ounces.
