Old Lobsters May Reach Weight of Thirty-Five Pounds

The lobster has at least one claim to fame—it can live to be old! The age of some lobsters, at death, has been estimated to be from 40 to 50 years!

Often, of course, lobsters have no freedom to grow old. They are gathered and sent to market while still rather young. Many persons like to eat lobster salad and so on, and that keeps great numbers of these salt-water animals from reaching a ripe old age.

Usually we may say, "The larger the lobster, the oldor it is." Along the Atlantic coast, some old lobsters have been found to have a body with a length of two feet. Such a lobster will weigh about 35 pounds, and its crushing claw may have a length of from 16 to 20 inches. The crushing claw of a very large lobster is likely to be thicker than a man's arm!

I speak of "the crushing claw," but there are two arms, or legs, of a lobster which are armed with strong pincers. One of these is larger than the other, and is known as the crushing claw. The smaller claw can be used for holding to an object while the other does its work of striking at an enemy or crushing a victim.

Lobsters are greedy and eat almost anything in the nature of fish or flesh. Crawling about the sea bottom, they are quite willing to capture their near-relatives, the crabs. They even have been known to eat other lobsters, and for this reason they can be classed as "cannibals."

When two lobsters meet, they may take part in a battle. During such a struggle, one or both may lose the crushing claw. If that happens, and if a lobster is not killed in the fight, he can grow a new claw. The new one is not so large as the one which is lost.

"Lobster pots" are boxlike traps commonly made of wood. They have openings into which a lobster can go, but through which he cannot get out again.

The lobster has a sense of smell, and this—along with his greed for food—leads him into trouble. Smelling dead fish in a lobster pot, he makes his way there and gets inside.

When a lobster is boiled, it changes in color from greenish or bluish brown to red. A certain artist did not know this fact when he put one in a seashore painting. Using a boiled lobster, bought from a store, as a model, he painted it in the act of crawling on the sand and gave it a deep red color!
