PURITANS COMPLAINED ABOUT STARCH AND PERFUME ON BEARDS

The idea of shaving the hair from the face has been followed in many countries at many times. Yet beards have lasted through the ages. Sometimes the men in a country have followed the "smooth skin" style for a century or so, then have gone back to the beard. Quite often the king set the fashion for his fellow countrymen.

One French king was too young to raise a beard, and shaved off what few hairs he did grow on his chin. This led French gentlemen to give up their beards.

During the time of Queen Elizabeth, Englishmen followed whatever beard, custom they chose. Some wore short beards, others long. We are told that the queen sent to a foreign country an ambassador with a beard five feet long Short, pointed beards were popular among men of fashion while James I and Charles I were ruling Great Britain. It was usual for smart, pointed mustaches to be worn with those beards.

Puritans of that time complained about the hours which men wasted in starching their beards and putting perfume on them. They also objected to the curling of beards "with irons and quills."

While Queen Anne was on the British throne, the men who were her subjects fell into the custom of shaving all the hair from their faces. It was seldom that one was seen with any sort of beard or mustache.

In the days of powdered wigs for men, the smooth face was common. It must have seemed there was enough trouble taking care of the wig with its curls, without adding more in the dressing of a mustache and beard.

During the nineteenth century, beards became popular in Great Britain once more. In the United States and Canada they also enjoyed wide favor. Most men who had them would trim them, but would not spend much time on them.

Some men shaved the beards from their chins but allowed their side whiskers to grow, along with their mustaches. In other cases they wore only a mustache or a set of wide whiskers.

As I said in a story some time ago, the coming of the safety razor has done a great deal toward ending beards during the present century. Even in Russia, where they used to flourish, they are now largely things of the past.
