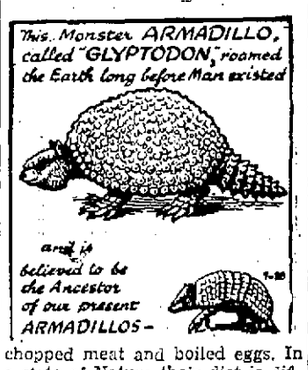
Uncle Ray's Corner

Armadillo Ancestor Had Shell Without Movable Rings

Yesterday I said that tame armadillos have been fed with milk, chopped meat and boiled eggs. In a state of Nature their diet is different. They eat insects such as grasshoppers, ants, and beetles, and also feast on worms, snails and lizards. Some of them eat snakes.



Not only is the body of an armadillo covered with bony plates, but also its head, tail and parts of its legs.

On its four short legs, the armadillo moves over the ground. It cannot climb a tree, but it is able to dig in the ground. On its front feet are claws which are very useful in making holes.

For a little distance an armadillo can make good speed. Then it grows tired and takes a rest. If it is running from an enemy, and is some distance ahead, it may start to "dig in," working very fast. In a few minutes it can make a hole large enough to hold its body.

Many armadillos live in Argentina. It is believed that South America was the first home of the tribe.

The other day I saw a skeleton of an armadillo in a museum. Alongside that skeleton were the remains of a far larger animal, the Glyptodon.

The Glyptodon is one of the many animals which lived long ago but which do not live today. Almost certainly it was the ancestor of the modern armadillo.

Glyptodons did not have movable bands around their bodies. Instead they were covered with solid shells. Sometimes the shell was eight feet long and six feet wide.

Glyptodon skeletons have been found in many parts of South America, also in Mexico and in a few southern parts of the United States. The oldest of the skeletons were dug up in South America.

Certain Glyptodons grew to a length of 14 or 15 feet, counting head and tail. All of these big fellows are dead now, but we may look upon the much smaller armadillos of the present time as their great-great-grandchildren.
