Greeks Drank from Quer "Cups" and Ate With Fingers

People of the United Nations speak of Greece in a friendly way, but we do not think of it as a leading country of the present-day world. Yet there was a time when Greece led all nations in progress. That was more than 2,000 years ago. In the time of Socrates, Greece held the place of Egypt as first in civilization among all countries.

Greece kept the lead for something like 300 years. During that period it was first in the arts of building, painting and sculpture. It also led in "philosophy," or what we may speak of as "the art of thinking."

Many objects remain which give us facts about the everyday life of the ancient Greeks. For example we have found several rhytons" which they used, at times, for drinking liquids. These were made of clay, but were roughly in the shape of animal horns.

The rhytons, or drinking horns, of the Greeks were hollow. They would hold liquids, but each of them had a small opening at the lower end. A person was supposed to let the liquid drop through the opening into his mouth!

The lower end of a Greek drinking horn was shaped like the head of a woman, a god, a goddess, a furry animal or a bird. The hole for the liquid passed through the mouth of this ornament.

It seems queer to us that people ever drank from such things, but let us not suppose that the Greeks had no other utensils for the purpose. They also drank from clay cups and bowls, and from goblets.

At the family dinner table there was a sofa, or couch, for the master of the house. Resting on his left elbow, or his back, he would lie there while eating the meal. His wife would take a seat at the foot of the sofa, and the children would sit on chairs or stools.

The Greeks ate most of the meats which are common today. They had beef, veal and pork, and also ate the flesh of geese and quails. Sometimes they were served with small birds such as pigeons and thrushes. Fish was a very usual item on their tables.

Spoons were used at meals by the Greeks, but there were no forks, and seldom did anyone use a knife while eating. Meats were cut up before being placed on the low tables. All the family had the custom of handling food with the fingers.

A servant passed a bowl of water around before the meal, and at its close. This was done so the persons eating could rinse their hands.
