Sailboats Offered First Known Means of Power Transport

Two boys, each 11 years old, are proud of themselves these days. With their own hands they have built a small boat, and have used it on a lake. The boat is large enough for only one of them to ride in comfort at a time, but I have watched them as they took turns paddling the little craft about. They used a two-bladed paddle which they also made themselves.

Those boys have put in a great deal of hard work building and painting the boat, calking the seams with tar and plastic wood, and so on. Now they are planning to make a little sail to use on their boat.

Whether it is safe for boys to go on the water in homemade craft is a question which must be answered in each special case. The boys of whom I speak are both good swimmers. A life preserver is kept in the boat. The owners know that in case of an upset the best thing to do is to cling to the boat. When a boat is upside down in the water, it will serve as a kind of raft. Many a person has saved his life by "staying with the boat," instead of trying to swim a long distance to shore.

The thing which interests me most about this adventure is that these boys—Maurice and Pat—are going through an old story in the history of the human race. When man first rode on wood in water, they no doubt paddled with their hands, or let the current of a river carry them. Then we can figure that they used poles or wooden paddles to push the craft where they wanted it to go.

A "CATBOAT"

Later came the sail. It may have been made from animal hides, from woven rushes or from cloth. In any case, it was an effort to make wind do the work of moving a raft or boat. Sails on boats must have been the first means of "power transport" ever used in the history of the human race.

That old form of power transport has lasted down the thousands of years. Today we have scores of kinds of sailboats and sailing vessels.

A popular form of the sailboat is the "catboat." This has a single mast placed well to the front, or bow. The large sail has a long pole, or boom, along its lower edge. The boom swings about as the wind changes. People in a catboat must be careful that their heads do not get bumped when the boom swings over.
