SOME KINDS OF CATFISH CAN BREATHE AIR

WHAT is the difference between a catfish and a bullhead?

That question can be answered simply—all bullheads are catfish, but many catfish are not bullheads. The bullhead is a special kind of catfish. There are 23 main families of catfish.

The common bullhead is found only in North America, but it has a close relative in China. It is a small fish, seldom more than a foot long. It lies in ponds, lakes and slow rivers, chiefly in the eastern half of the continent, from southern Canada to Florida.

Other catfish are widespread over the world. They are found in Asia, Africa, Europe and South America. The various kinds differ a great deal in size and ways of life.

The common catfish habit is to take good care of the young. Most fish have no nests, but catfish not only make nests but also watch over the young. The male catfish swims near shore with the little ones, and guards them as well as possible against enemies.

Catfish will stay alive out of water for a longer time than most fish. There is no catfish on this continent which can be classed as "air-breathing," but South America has some which can breathe air for hours at a time. A mining engineer in the Andes mountains reported:

"We had to change the course of a stream to empty a pot-hole. When the water was taken from the hole, I saw a number of catfish make their way out. Helped by the use of their fins, they climbed a bank and reached the stream above."

The catfish of which the engineer spoke are known as "prenadillas." They are not the only kind of catfish which can live out of water. Another South American type, the "Doras," moves from one pond to another during the dry season. It has been reported to "travel all night." Most fish are silent, but the Doras has an air bladder which gives forth small sounds. While under water, of course, all catfish use their gills for breathing.

The Mississippi catfish reaches a weight of 25 pounds. Some of the catfish taken from Lake Erie and Lake Ontario have had a length of three or four feet and have weighed more than 150 pounds.

In China and India, fishermen often use a "fishing cat" to capture small catfish. This cat is an expert at holding on to the slippery game and will take the fish to its master.
