Lansing Mayor, in Navy Uniform, Instructor Here

Lieut. Sam Street Hughes, at present on leave of absence as mayor of Lansing, Mich., has been added to the staff of the naval training schools here. His duties are in connection with the newly established college V-12 program.

A graduate of Berea college, in Kentucky, Lieut. Hughes received the LL.B. degree at Harvard law school in 1928 and the J. D. degree at the University of Chicago law school in 1929. He was a municipal judge at Lansing from 1932 to 1941, and was elected mayor in April, 1941.

Lieut. Hughes was the first president and one of the founders of the Lansing Junior Chamber of Commerce, and in 1932 and 1933 was vice president of the U. S. Junior Chamber of Commerce. Before his commissioning in the navy last April, he was vice president of the Michigan Municipal league.

After his commissioning, Lieut. Hughes was assigned to temporary duty at the navy's midshipman's school on the campus of Columbia university. This is his second naval billet.

MOST monkeys of the New World can cling to tree branches by their tails, but not the monkeys of Africa. Many African monkeys have good-sized tails, but have little use for them except as "decorations."

Whether a tail makes a monkey better-looking is a question. Perhaps it does not help them in the eyes of people, but some monkeys may be proud of their "big, beautiful tails."

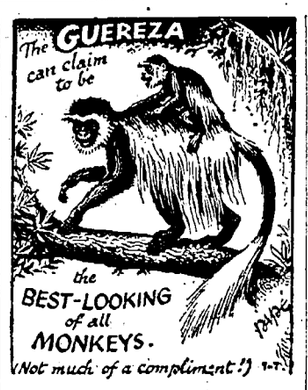
Monkeys spend most of their time in trees. They live chiefly on leaves, fruits and insects. They are given credit for holding down plagues of locusts, since they destroy great numbers of those harmful insects.

Among the monkeys which feast on locusts are the "guerezas." They live in Africa from Ethiopia almost down to the southern end of the continent.

Some guereza monkeys are entirely black. Others are red all over, and still others are black and white.

A black-and-white type is found in Kenya, a British colony in eastern Africa. It has white hair about the face. Its back is covered with black hair, but a sheet of long white hair falls down on each side of its body. Part of the tail is black, but the second half widens into a large white "brush."

That monkey—like its relatives—is an expert at climbing about trees and in swinging from branch to branch. Sometimes it lets go of a high limb on one tree, and leaps across a distance of 30 or 40 feet, catching a limb at a lower level in another tree.



Guereza monkeys sometimes give their babies rides through the dense African forests. A little one may be seen clinging to the mother's back as she travels about high in the trees.

These monkeys often go about the forests in bands with from 15 to 20 members. Such a band is made up of several families, but all the members probably are related, as "cousins" and so on.

Guereza monkey skins were in demand in Europe in past times. Thousands of the monkeys were killed so their long hair could be used as trimming for cloth coats of women. In one year—1894—skins to this number of 168,000 were shipped to Europe and sold for $210,000. Later locust plagues in Africa were blamed in part on the killing of so many of these monkeys.
