Splashing Stones Saved Kingfisher from Capture by Hawk

ON A summer day a hawk saw some kittens with their mother in a barnyard. Quickly the bird swooped down and seized one of the kittens in its talons.

The mother cat saw the enemy, and sprang at it just as it was rising from the ground. Dropping the kitten, the hawk clawed the cat about the head, but the bird, itself, was hurt, one of its wings being broken.

Thanks largely to the broken wing of its enemy, the cat was able to finish the fight with success. In a few moments, the hawk lay dead on the ground. The farmer was too far away to take a hand in the fight, but when he came close he found that the cat had been blinded in one eye. The kitten had suffered cuts from the talons of the hawk, but was not mortally wounded.

That is one of many cases where animals have been known to fight back against enemies. Hawks get most of their food by killing certain kinds of animals, but those animals do their best to escape by hiding, running away or fighting.

Exciting contests have taken place between sparrow hawks and kingfishers. The kingfisher usually falls a victim, no matter how cleverly he may dodge, but he is likely to lead the other bird an exciting chase.

Oliver G. Pike tells of a time when he stood on a bridge with another boy while he watched a sparrow hawk go after a kingfisher. Just as the stronger bird was about to strike, the kingfished dived into the river.

The hawk hovered over the water, and when the kingfisher came to the surface, it swept down to strike again. Once more the kingfisher saved itself with a dive.

In the end the kingfisher probably would have fallen a victim if the boys had not picked up good-sized stones and dropped them in the water. The splashing caused by the stones alarmed the sparrow hawk for a moment, taking its eyes away from its prey—and the kingfisher used that moment to escape!

Sparrow hawks are the smallest members of the hawk family. Usually they are no more than 11 or 12 inches long, but they have some of the fierce striking power of larger hawks.
