CHILDREN OF ANCIENT TIMES PLAYED WITH TOYS

AS CHRISTMAS Day draws close, boys and girls look forward to the toys and games which may come their way. In wartime, the supply may not be so large, but there are plenty of toys, just the same.

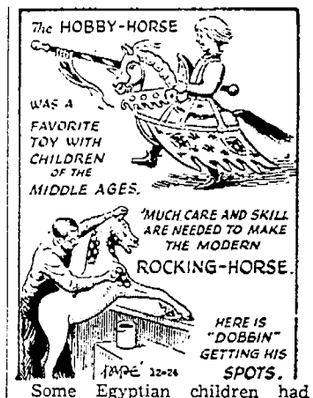
Something in the nature of children makes them want to play with toys. If they do not have enough of them from stores, they are likely to build their own playthings.

Indian children seem to have had a few kinds of toys before white men came to the New World. We are told that some Indian boys were found playing with wooden tops when white explorers first reached their tents on the western prairies. Many Indian girls are believed to have played with small dolls back in the days before Columbus.

Dolls were used as playthings in ancient Egypt, Greece and Rome. Some of these dolls have been saved down to the present day.

In the British museum in London is a flat wooden doll which was found in an Egyptian tomb. It has paint marks to show the face. Strings of beads, fastened to the head, were meant to stand for hair. The beads were made from mud.

The little girl who owned that wooden doll probably was a member of a poor family. Many other Egyptian dolls were made of better material. Another doll in the same museum is a bronze figure of a woman holding a jar on her head.



Some Egyptian children had dolls with arms and legs which would move. Others had toy crocodiles with jaws would move.

Roman boys played with hoops and tops. Like Greek boys of early times, they had balls to use in games. Often the balls were made of leather stuffed with wool or dry grass.

In these modern times, we have gone far above ancient folk in the toy industry. Millions of dollars are spent each year on toys. What would a child of ancient times think if he could make a visit to the toy section of a present-day department store?
