APACHES MADE RAIDS ON PEACEFUL PUEBLO INDIANS

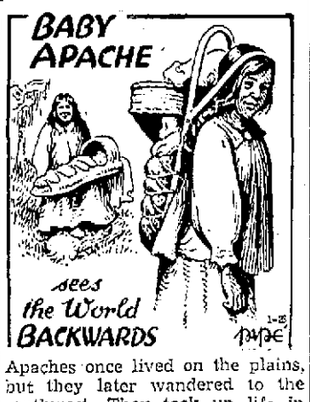
LIKE the Mongols of Asia, many American Indian tribes used to wander from place to place. The Indians who wandered most lived on the western plains of the United States and Canada.

Indians of the plains had no livestock. Their only domestic animals were dogs, and the main value of the dogs was to drag tents and poles from one camp to another. There were no wheeled carts for this purpose, but the "travois" had been invented. This device was made of two long poles and a short pole, tied together, and on it the tribesmen loaded their goods.

After the coming of the Spaniards, some Indians began to use horses. These were stolen from the Spaniards, or had run away from Spanish camps and had formed "wild herds." Many warriors showed daring when they captured and rode animals from such herds.

In those ways the tribesmen obtained their so-called "Indian ponies." Some warriors made great use of them, riding far and wide.

Among the most skillful riders were the Apaches, who were related to the Navahos. Many Apaches once lived on the plains, but they later wandered to the southwest. They took up life in northern Mexico, and in the states now known as Texas, New Mexico and Arizona.



The peaceful Pueblo Indians were attacked by the Apaches from time to time. It is believed that the name "Apache," meaning "enemy," was first given to the tribe by the Pueblos.

There was a time when buffaloes, or bison, roamed over southwestern parts of the United States, as well as the plains. In those days, the Apaches were able to get a good supply of food by shooting the big beasts with bows and arrows, or striking them with spears.

The white man's musket brought an end to the easy supply of buffalo meat, and this led the Apaches to look for other kinds of food. Since many of them spent their time wandering over deserts and mountains, they had a hard time finding enough to eat. That partly explains the many raids which they made on white settlers and on the villages of other Indian tribes.
