Each Starfish Arm Has "Eye Spot" Near Its Tip

Nature's supply of strange animals seems never to come to an end. In the air, on the ground, and under the sea we find more and more of them.

Among the "under - the - sea" animals are starfish. There is not just one kind of starfish, but hundreds of kinds.

Despite their name, starfish do not belong to the fish family. They have no fins or scales, and their shape is different from that of any known fish.

Most starfish have five arms which stretch out from the central body. The body itself is hardly more than a stomach with a mouth to let the food get inside.

There are eyes, or at least "eye spots," on a starfish. Each of the arms has one of them, out near the tip. Tests seem to have proved that these tell the animal whether it is in daylight or darkness, but they cannot "see" in any other sense of the word.

Starfish differ a great deal in size. Some are only an inch or two wide when full-grown. Others are six or eight inches wide, and still others have a width of well over a foot. Off the coast of California, starfish two feet wide have been picked up!

Over the upper side of a starfish, we find a hard coating made of lime. This coating is of use in guarding against enemies. It takes the place of a shell, but does not keep the animal from bending its arms when it wants to move.

The so-called "arms" of a starfish are fitted with "feet"! Each arm has scores of tiny tubes which are of help in moving about.

Thanks to its "tube feet," this creature can climb the sides of a slippery rock at the bottom of the sea. Small muscles in the arms also play a part in climbing and walking or crawling.

The "bird's foot" starfish has flesh which spreads from one arm to another, and may be compared to the webbed foot of a goose. It grows to be four or five inches wide.

Starfish are related to "brittle stars," also to sea urchins and sea cucumbers.
