Ross Lauds Maloney As District Attorney

In six years as district attorney, Norris E. Maloney has demonstrated by an enviable record that law violators regardless of position will be prosecuted, Atty. Frank Ross said in a radio talk Sunday night.

Speaking in behalf of Maloney's candidacy for reelection on the Progressive ticket, Ross said Dane county is "very fortunate in having first class police departments and a good sheriff in John Arnold to coordinate their work and cooperate with Dist. Atty. Maloney.

"No doubt on many occasions it has been difficult and unpleasant for Norris to do his job when he had to prosecute fellow lawyers or public officials with whom he was acquainted but never has he faltered or hesitated," Ross declared.

Johnston to Speak in Milwaukee

Reservations for a dinner Dec. 6 in Milwaukee at which Eric A. Johnston, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, will make his first Wisconsin appearance, may be made with the Madison Business assn., Gifford 1464.

Johnston, president of the national association since 1942, recently returned from a trip to Russia, highlight of which was a three hour conference with Marshall Stalin. The dinner is to be held at the Milwaukee auditorium.

Palace on Island of Crete Holds World's Oldest Throne

Between Greece and Egypt is a sea, and in that sea is the island of Crete, which has been in the war news from time to time.

Crete is not so widely-known as some other islands, but it contains the ruins of one of the great palaces of olden times. Long ago it served as a "half-way station" for Egyptian learning which passed to Greece. Some of the Greek ideas of religion were gained from Crete.

An ancient Greek story tells about "seven youths and seven maidens" who were sent from Athens to Crete as a yearly tribute. The youths and maidens, 'twas said, were fed to the Minotaur, a monster with a bull's head and a man's body, when they reached the palace of King Minos. At last the Minotaur was slain by the hero Theseus.

That tale grew from the fancy of an ancient story-teller who had run out of other ideas. There surely was never a real Minotaur, but it may be that a tribute of some kind was paid to the once-powerful king of Crete.

Early in the present century, scientists visited Crete and found the remains of a large building known as the Palace of Minos. Most of the walls were destroyed long ago, but we may see now some of the pillars which held it up, and several stone stairways. It appears that the palace was square, measuring about 450 feet on each side.

Underground chambers have been found at the site of the palace, and several of these contained huge clay jars. Several jars are taller than a man of average height, and were used to hold olive oil.

The Palace of Minos was built about 3,500 years ago, in the city of Cnossus. We do not know when or how the palace was destroyed, but there are marks of fire about the remains. Possibly the fire took place after an earthquake.

One section of the remains is known as the "throne room." In it is the "oldest throne in the world." Carved out of rock, this throne has kept its shape through thousands of years, and is in almost perfect condition. Near the throne are stone benches which probably were used by high officers of the court.
