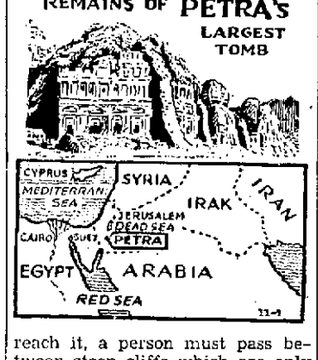
Arab Tribesmen Used "City of Rock" as Robber Stronghold

About 50 miles south of the Dead Sea are the remains of a strange city. It is known as Petra, and for hundreds of years it was a "lost city." It was found again by travelers in 1807.

The name "Petra" means "City of Rock." It is a hollow in the midst of huge, towering rocks. To reach it, a person must pass between steep cliffs which are only 12 feet apart. These cliffs rise straight upward to a height of more than one-fifth of a mile.



After passing between the cliffs, you come to the opening where Petra was built. About 2,200 years ago, men and women from a tribe of Arabs reached the spot and started a village there. This village grew into a city.

The men of Petra spent much of their time as robbers. Living in the northwestern corner of Arabia, they were close to caravan routes, and often they would attack caravans. In that way they obtained food and other goods.

It was hard for enemy tribesmen to punish the men of Petra. The narrow gorge could be defended easily, and it seems that many attempts to reach the city failed.

As time went on, the people of Petra learned to make their living in a more honest way. Perhaps using camels which they had stolen, they started caravans of their own, and took things to market.

An open-air theater was built in Petra, and we can see some of the stone seats today. This theater was large enough for a crowd of about 3,000 persons.

A custom grew of making tombs for the dead in hollows cut into the rocky cliffs near Petra. These tombs have been studied during modern times.

Roman soldiers were able, at last, to gain entrance to Petra. They plundered it, and from that time onward the city lost its importance. In time there was nothing there except tombs and ruined buildings.

Petra was found again 137 years ago. The open space in which the city stood is three-fourths of a mile wide and slightly more than a mile long. There are thousands of tombs in the cliffs, and these, more than anything else, have brought wonder to visitors.
