ARCH OF TRIUMPH IN PARIS MARKS NAPOLEON'S VICTORIES

Whenever there is a "victory march" in Paris, the path of the procession is almost sure to pass through the Arc de Triomphe, or Arch of Triumph.

The Arc de Triomphe is in a public square in the heart of Paris. It was built more than a century ago to mark the victories of Napoleon Bonaparte. This is the largest arch of the kind to be found anywhere. It is 147 feet wide and 162 feet high.

After the first World war, the "Tomb of the Unknown Soldier" was placed under the Arch of Triumph. It contains the body of a soldier who died in that war, with no mark on him to show his name or the place where he had lived.

Many soldiers who lost their lives between 1914 and 1918 were buried without names being placed on their graves. This fact caused several countries to prepare tombs which, in each case, contained the remains of a man who represented all of the nation's nameless dead of that war.

Men and women of France go to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Paris, and have the idea that it may hold the remains of a lost relative. Among the other countries which have such tombs are the United States and Great Britain. In the United States the Unknown Soldier rests in Arlington National cemetery, and in Great Britain he lies in Westminster Abbey.

The people of Paris were joyful when their city was set free last summer. It had been surrendered to the Germans in 1940 without any special struggle to defend it.

The Germans had control of it for four years and two months. They left it without making much of a fight to hold it, and it still is in very good condition, so far as buildings are concerned. It has not suffered from bombs in the way London, Berlin and many other cities have suffered.

Paris is the home of the Louvre, one of the world's great art galleries and museums. The first part of this huge building was erected more than 700 years ago. Since then, many additions and changes have been made. It served for a time as a fort, and at other times it was used as a prison and as a royal palace. As a result of the French Revolution the Louvre was turned into an art museum in 1793.
