Uncle Ray's Corner

Clown Showed Crowd How to Drink Beer While Upside Down

One afternoon a circus clown stood on his head while he drank beer from a glass mug.

We might better say that the clown seemed to drink the liquid. I never have tried such a stunt, but I feel sure that no liquid will go into a person's throat while he is upside down.

Yet the beer went out of sight. What happened to it? That is the question.

The clown had a queer-looking mustache, and it seems likely that the mustache hid a small tube. Probably the tube was joined to a rubber bulb under his jacket. Working the bulb with his arm, he may have pressed air out of it so the liquid would be drawn in through the tube.

However the trick was done, people looked at that clown with great interest. He seemed to be making beer travel uphill!

Since that day and long before it, clowns have been busy with tricks of one kind or another. The stunts we see them perform nowadays may be old or new. An old trick may bring a laugh, but the clowns always are on the lookout for something different.

Joe Pentland was one of the well known clowns who traveled with a circus during the past century. He used to crack jokes in front of the crowd.

One day people at a circus saw a man, wearing the clothing of a sailor, rise from his seat in the grandstand.

"That little lady on the milk-white horse does not know how to ride," the man shouted. "I could do better myself!"

"Is that so!" the ringmaster shouted back. "Well come on down and show what you can do."

So the "sailor" tried his fortune on the steed, and in a second was thrown off. Again and again he mounted, each time with the same result. The crowd laughed and jeered until the man took off the sailor's uniform and appeared in "spangled tights." He was Joe Pentland, and soon proved to the crowd that he was an expert rider.

It is a custom of modern clowns to cover their faces with "clown white." This is a mixture of lard and talcum powder, along with oxide of zinc and tincture of benzoin. The mixture has been in use for almost 400 years.
