AST APRIL the Sports Editor of the Boston Traveler wrote: "the anguished disbelief of Arnold Palmer was one of the dramatic pictures in the televising of the Masters Golf Tournament ... a great sports spectacle."

A sports writer on the Boston Herald called the broadcast "superbly handled." Across the country other critics and sports writers bubbled exuberantly over the way the CBS Television Network's cameras handled the coverage of the tournament, calling it "by far the best golf show ever shown ... the finest ever screened ... the most ex-/ pert in commentary we have ever witnessed...no other medium can touch what television did here," etc., etc.

Well, this should be reason enough to stay home next Saturday between 5:30 and 6:30 pm and Sunday between 5 and 6:30 pm (both EDT) and watch the 41st Annual PGA Championship Tournament in Minneapolis, on the same Network and handled by the same skillful commentators and camera crews. Dow Finsterwald will be defending his title and Art Wall, Billy Casper and Arnold Palmer (among others) will be attacking it. We can safely predict that someone's face is bound to reveal that look of anguished disbelief. So, as the French say, en garde!

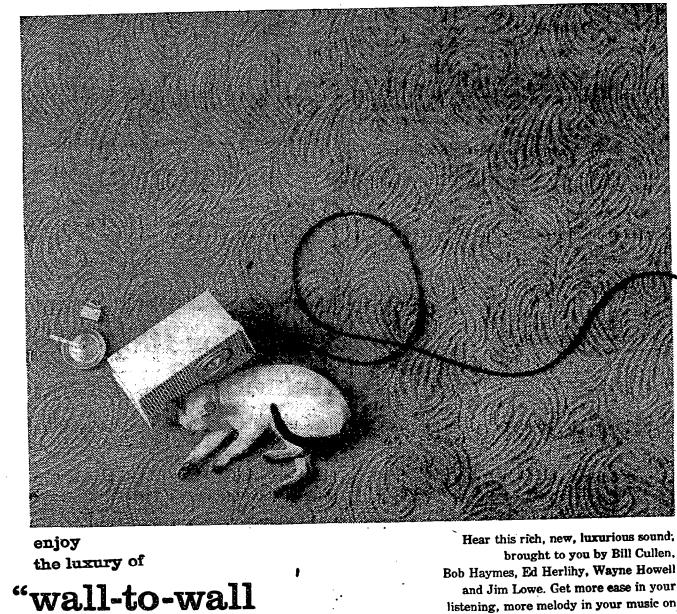

Being in the television business, we find anything of an optical or visual nature completely captivating. So when our eye recently fell on an article in the Winter issue of The American Scholar entitled "What Do Animals See?" we instantly started reading.

We read that a hawk flying over the Empire State Building can see a dime lying on the sidewalk on Fifth Avenue, whereas a bee practically has to be on top of a flower before it can see it. A flag doesn't have to be red to excite a bull; he's color blind, like the dog, the cat, the pig and the sheep. Indeed, Man is virtually alone among the mammals to enjoy the pleasure of color vision. A mouse can see from horizon to horizon. But an American citizen sitting in front of his television set in Seattle can see a rocket take off in Cape Canaveral. Florida, or Red Skelton take off in Television City, Hollywood.
