We Are Human Bullets!

By H. O. THOMPSON
(United Press Staff Correspondent)
TIENSIN (By Mail)—(UP)—H. Masaki is a quiet, pleasant little chap with horn-rimmed spectacles, and weighs not more than 100 pounds. He started on a military career and poor health made him give it up. But he carried on the traditions of a military family when, single-handed, he captured the hostilities, before Masaki's father, Gen. Jinsaburo-Masaki, was acquitted in Tokyo of any connection with the February revolt of last year. Young Masaki a junior official in the Japanese foreign office, went from Tiensin to the river mouth at Tangu and started a campaign by himself.
In some manner he had obtained a pistol. Traveling was dangerous then. He arrived at Tangu just as the Japanese were opening up on the mud forts there. Spying a small dory which had been abandoned by its owner and overcome by patriotic ardor, Masaki poled his way out to a small gunboat, clambered aboard and shouted:
"In the name of the Japanese empire I demand that you surrender."
The crew, amazed at the sight of this civilian scrambling upon the deck and awed a bit by the pistol, grinned sheepishly and let Masaki run up the rising Sun flag. They knew they'd be taken anyway and this was more fun than being blown up by shells.
Masaki is not very talkative and says much. He is adored by Japanese newspapermen, who say that Masaki has performed other dangerous missions with the same modesty.
Capt. Tatsu Nishihara was drinking lemonade in the bar at the Wagon Lits Hotel in Peiping and we got to talking about the Japanese attitude toward war.
"There is a proverb," he said, "an arrow can pierce a stone. It goes back to the story of the hunter in ancient times who saw a tiger and shot at it with bow and arrow. When he went to get the animal he found that he had shot at a big stone, and that it wasn't a tiger at all. And the arrow had pierced the stone."
"He went back and tried it again. But every time after that the arrow glanced off the stone. He knew that only faith had made it possible the first time and once he realized he was shooting at a stone and not at a tiger the arrow had no effect."
Nishihara, a young artillery officer who soon afterward went back to Japan to train anti-aircraft gunners, sipped his drink and went on:
"That is why we can overcome such odds against us. It is faith in our destiny. We are human bullets, I am a human bullet. My body is only a bullet and I am ready to have it used as such at any time. My body is not important except that some day it may be of use that way. It is for my Emperor."
One of the trains which after the fighting took 10 hours or more for the Peiping-Tientsin run, normally a matter of three hours, was crowded but two soldiers, spying two pretty Japanese girls and thinking perhaps of future leisure hours, offered them their seats. The girls smiled, accepted, excused themselves for a moment and returned with their husbands. The husbands bowed politely and calmly sat down in the vacated places.

An infantry officer told me this story. A private soldier, Yukio Yamaguchi, fighting at Tsangchow, killed four Chinese before dying with a bullet through his heart. His elder brother heard of it, asked his captain if he could be excused a moment and said, "You have died nobly. I will avenge you."
Three days later Masaru Yamaguchi killed six Chinese in hand-to-hand fighting and then was fatally wounded.
"Brother, I have kept my promise," he said. "Long live the Emperor."

SCOTT'S SCRAP BOOK By R. J. SCOTT
Takes two grooms to give a Japanese Josa Cook an airing - one to carry the mother and one to carry the tail - in bad weather the tail is wrapped in tissue paper and rolled up like a rope.
The first collie dogs probably were black - the name collie comes from collie, which means black or sooty.
