Uncle Ray gives picture stories of History, Science, Travel and Adventure. Story of European Stag and American Deer Is Told in Pictures

1. Here our artist shows six periods in the story of the antlers of a European stag. Having lost his horns of the year before, the stag sprouts two "knobs" in the spring. In about a month, they start branching out. Later they lose their velvety, hairy covering, and the points get to be sharp, as in figures "5" and "6."

2. By late summer, the stag is well fitted to defend the does and fawns with his antlers, also with the hoofs of his forefeet. Wolves sometimes attack deer, but they choose a fawn or a doe as their victims. The stag is not afraid of them, and rather than let harm come to his family, he rushes at the enemy.

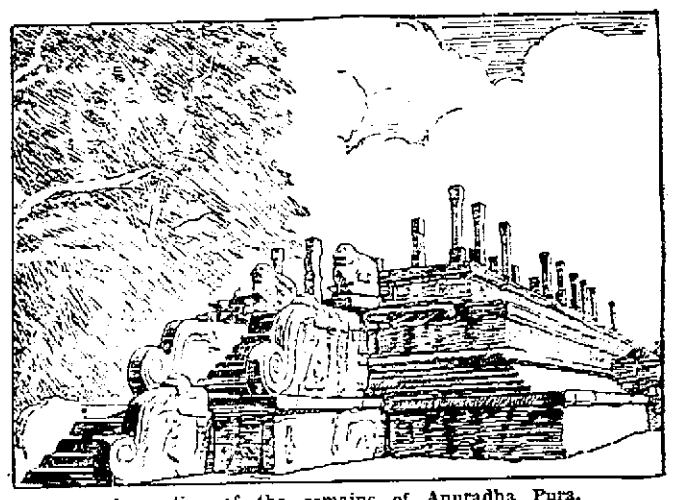

3. Among the large North American deer is the wapiti. It is related to the European red deer, but is larger. Sometimes the wapiti is called "the American elk." Big, wide-spreading horns of interesting shape are grown by the moose. In most branches of the deer family, only the males have antlers, but the reindeer doe has them.

Uncle Ray's Corner Anuradha Pura Was Built in Ceylon 2400 Years Ago

Twenty-four hundred years ago, a city was started by the Singhalese, the chief residents of Ceylon. It grew and became the largest city on the island. Then, as a result of invasion and warfare, it fell to ruin and became a "lost city."

A portion of the remains of Anuradha Pura.

Anuradha Pura is the name was given to the city. It means "City of Ninety Kings" and may have referred to many small kingdoms in Ceylon during early times.

A Holy Hill Before speaking of the remains found at Anuradha Pura, I wish to tell of a holy hill a few miles distant. On and near the top of this hill—which is about 1,000 feet high, are the ruins of temples and a monastery built by order of King Tissa. One of these is a dome-shaped building more than 150 feet high.

On top of the dome scores of trees have grown. Just how the soil got there is something of a mystery. Perhaps the wind blew sand and dust there, dropping the sediment in worn parts of the dome. At any rate the trees were found there in modern times. It is supposed the seeds blown there by the wind.

Wide Stone Steps Wide stone steps lead up one side of the high hill. These number 1,840. Most of them were formed from long slabs of granite. The last 150, leading to the top, were cut from solid rock.

Along the sides of the holy hill are words carved in the rock long ago. Most of the writing can be read today. Here, in short, is the meaning of the few of the things written there:

"No one who takes the life of any person or animal can live near this hill."

"All persons who take part in temple services shall have money to buy flowers."

"Sick persons shall be given good care and the right kinds of food."

"During one period, the City of Ninety Kings may have been the home of a million people. Even higher estimates of its population have been made."

After King Tissa was converted to Buddhism by a missionary from India, he gave up 18 square miles of his pleasure grounds. This land, in the heart of the city, was used for temples, dagobas, homes for priests and monks, and so on.

We are told that a golden plow was employed to mark the limits of the grounds given to the priests and monks. Here is a record of the ceremony as it has come down to us:

"In the morning, drums were beaten. The horns of the chief priest, and the road leading to it, had been decorated. The Lord of Chariots, in his royal robes, sat in his chariot, and was attended by his ministers and the women of his palace."

"The party was joined by priests and went to the upper ferry of the river. The marking of the limits started. A golden plow was pulled by two large elephants. The king, himself, held half the plow."

"As the Lord of the Land made his progress, there was music of every kind. Happy shouts arose from the watching throngs. People held up banners, baskets filled with flowers, umbrellas with gold and silver handles, and beautiful painted vases."

On Feb. 27 I shall tell more about the City of Ninety Kings, especially about the mighty palace which existed there. (For travel section of my scrapbook.)

A Talk with Uncle Ray

For people who like to look at strange trees in a great place and last all through the summer until October.

The other day I spoke of the cinnamon, which adds many extra trunks and spreads out so that on one tree sometimes looks like a little forest.

More than 5,000,000 pounds of cinnamon have been exported from Ceylon in a single year. Cinnamon is a good example of the spices for which the Orient is famed.

Besides those ironwood, ebony, satinwood, neem, mills, domba and teak trees, also traveler's palms and many others. We do not have enough space today to tell about all the trees I have named, but at least we can take up the cinnamon, which provides a world-famous spice.

An old Roman record tells of the sale of cinnamon at the rate of $68 per pound. If we change old Roman money values into our present money, today a pound of cinnamon can be bought in Ceylon for 15 cents!

The wild cinnamon tree grows to a height of from 20 to 30 feet. It produces good cinnamon, but planters have found they can make more money if they keep down the height. For this reason, they trim and prune the young trees, and do not let them grow to be more than eight or 10 feet high. As a result, they look very much like tall bushes.

When the cinnamon tree is four or five years old, it is ready for its first cutting. Long sticks are cut from the thin branches. Then the sticks are taken in bundles and are taken to "peeling stores."

The trees blossom in January, and the fruit is ripe in April. It is the bark, however, and not the fruit
