Air Drama Tries Novel Technique

RadioActorsDefyTradition, Its Birthday Find New Studio Freedom

NEW YORK - Radio drama took an historic step in the studios of the National Broadcasting co. last month with the presentation of "Second Overture," an original one-act play written for radio by Maxwell Anderson, distinguished playwright. In that production a cast of 13 men and women abandoned their scripts and defied a tradition that has kept them shackled to a microphone since radio began. With a new-found freedom, they spoke their lines from memory, walked uninhibited from one end of the studio to the other, gesticulated with both arms and turned on their best dramatic expressions for their fellow actors to scutinize and respond to.

This cast, thanks to the recently developed uni-directional microphone, had stepped beyond the narrow confines of microphone technique in a singular performance which may well mark a nilestone in the history of radio drama.

The Handicap

To understand the importance of this new technique it is necessary to appreciate the handicap under which the radio actor works. The microphone and its limited range for action are paychologically distracting. The actor has little freedom for action he cannot gesture and move about without keeping one eye on the control room engineer and another on his script. Drama under these circumstances, it has long been felt, cannot be given its intrinsic warmth and sincerity.

It was to overcome these intangible obstacles that William S. Rainey, NBC'S director of production, decided to try this scriptless broadcast, using a microphone capable of picking up sound over a wider range than radio drama had been accustomed to.

"In such an arrangement," Rainey said, "there is better pacing and timing. An actor can actually listen to what another actor is saying, instead of searching through a script. It allows for greater integrity and sweep of scene. Costuming Distant

James Church, who produced the half hour play, declared that in order to have his performers fall naturally into their characters "they must not be hampered by scripts and hold within the limited boundaries of a standing mike." And now that radio actors are speaking from memory and walking about freely, will they take the next step—costumes and lights? Mr. Rainey thinks these innovations are too remote to comment upon. The expense and the time involved would militate against such innovations now.

Super-Roads Find Friends in Congress

By RUBY A. BLACK Journal Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON-The big push for three transcontinental superhighways, to cost six to eight billion dollars which would be returned in tolls collected, is on.

Sen. Robert J. Bulkley, (d., O.,) revived the idea, which is not new, by a talk with the president, and a group of liberals of all parties, including Rep. George J. Schneider, Appleton progressive, pushed it a little farther. The president said it might not be a bad idea.

Sen. Duffy, Wisconsin democrat, first to join Bulkley in the cam-paign of statements, said, "I believe Bulkley's plan will not only prove of practical value from the standpoint of progress and de-fens, but it also will be of inestimable value because of the fact that it would greatly increase em-

"The bonds issued by the project corporation would be retired and the interest paid through adequate yet not oppressive tolls, which have been estimated as feasible."
