After a hazardous 22-day crossng from London to New York, the 700-ton Sirius, first all-steam powered vessel to cross the Atlantic, sailed into New York harbor with 42 passengers aboard on April 23, 1838. Exactly 100 years later, the National Broadcasting co. will link wo modern ocean giants speeding toward New York with the NBC Radio City studies, for a program commemorating that first historic steam crossing.

A highlight of the broadcast will be a three-way interview between Graham McNamee, in New York: Commodore Robert B. Irving, on the Queen Mary about a day-and-a-half out of New York, and Capt. Giles C. Stedman of the S. S. Washington, approximately 300 miles off the Irish coast. The program from 7:30 to 8 tonight over WIBA-WMAQ also will include a brief dramatization of events connected with the Sirius'

"It's ghastly to think of putting piness because of Ronny. My wife that little boy in an institution! June's face was white as she spoke. "Then what do you propose to do with him?" It was old Mrs. Maynard who spoke. "Keep him here with you for another day," June told Alice: "Then I'll come back; I'll have some plan worked out by then." When Raymond knew of this! He said he liked the boy. He could not ask her to let them send Mable's son away. Not when she loved the boy so dearly.

She called Raymond long-distance and asked him to be at Smith's when she got there.

"Raymond," she commenced at once, still breathless, "when we're married we'll have well, enough noney, won't we?"

"More than enough," he laughed kissing her lightly. "Then we haven't their excuse of poverty." She put both her hands against his coat, pleadingly. "Oh Raymond, we can take Ron-ny, can't we?!" "Take Ronny?" She could feel his body stiffen at her words.

"They're going to send him away to an orphan's home!" she cried, "Think of that, Raymond! That adorable child in an institution! When he has us to care for him."

"Some of those institutions are very nice," he insisted firmly, "Now. June, we mustn't lose our heads over this thing. We have our own happiness at stake." Suddenly she shoved him away from her. Stepping backward she stood and looked at him. "Don't, June." He tried to touch her again, but she held up a hand to keep him away.

"Don't you understand?" asked. "Can't you see?"

"Understand what? See what?" She was no longer shaking with the force of her emotions; a strange calm had taken possession him slowly. "The end of everything between us." "You're being dramatic, June!

You're hysterical!":

"Raymond," she said evenly, "I'd give up my life before I'd let them put Ronny in any institution. Before I'd let them do that to him-I'd give up you." "But all our dreams, June! The great things we were going to do logether! Have you forgotten all those things? "I haven't forgotten," she an-"But somehow those things don't seem important now."

"It seems tragic that someone else's child should ruin both our "Ronny needn't ruin our lives." His smile was not agreeable. You're putting me on the spot, aren't you, June? You're making me choose either to take both of you or give you both up?" "You can put it any way you "Sorry to intrude!"

This is all mighty fine of you, Penn.

"Don't thank me," insisted Penn. 'I'm the happiest man on earth. And I'm doubly happy to have py, too. We've always been buddies." He turned again to her. "If you ever need me, June, you can always count on me. Now, if you'll both excuse me-
