Baseball's Problem Child Was Lucky to be Fired By JACK CUDDY (Copyright 1938 by United Press) NEW YORK—(U.P.)—Baseball's problem child comes home to his adopted papa. If you were asked to name a man in bigtime baseball who is dizzier than the great Dizzy Dean, whom would you designate? Of course we must eliminate Al Schacht, baseball's professional clown prince. Permitt me to stimulate your recollections by mentioning Wesley Cheek Ferrell.

Wesley Cheek Ferrell makes no attempt at being dizzy like Jerome Herman Dean or tall-coated Al Schacht. Yet he gets my unqualified vote. New York's former mayor, Jimmy Walker, said: "I'll match my private life with that of any man." And I say, "I'll match the goofy baseball career of W. C. Ferrell with that of any player you may name."

The dizziest thing about Ferrell's career is that the goofy side was entirely unintentional. His "checkered" career was governed entirely by the stars. His horoscope forecast everything that happened. How's This for Luck

Maybe Ferrell is right. Something extraordinary must guide the destinies of a man who could plunge into a garbage can and come out smelling like a lily. I mean Pitcher Ferrell was mighty lucky to be cast adrift unconditionally by Washington's Senators, and have all the major league clubs waive on him. And then to be snapped up by the New York Yankees who are coming toward their third straight American league pennant. I mean that Wes Ferrell, the guy nobody wanted, will cut in for at least a half-slice of the next world series melon. And that half-slice will come to at least $3,900. That's in addition to his salary, which was very substantial with Washington.

The first time Wes Ferrell created a furor in the public prints was about 1932 when he was throwing his right-handed smoke ball for Cleveland Indians. Remember? At that time he gave off a statement in which he said that Manager Joe McCarthy of the Yankees was the best manager in all baseball, and that he was confident the Yanks would win the pennant that season.

Well sir, Roger Peckinpaugh was managing the Indians at that time. When dark — completed Roger read that story, he almost jumped out of his skin. His irritation spread to other officials at Cleveland. Roger was so angry at all newspaper men that we almost had a fist fight, even though Ferrell meekly had denied the story—under pressure.

He's With Joe Now Meanwhile the great Ferrell continued his career. Peckinpaugh left the Indians, partly because of his disagreement with Wes. Walter Johnson "The Big Train" became manager, and Ferrell developed his famous sore arm. Wes, unable to pitch as he had done during his first four years as a regular on the big team—when he won 20 or more games each season—wanted to become an outfielder because he was a good batsman. Walter, however, was the fielder, and discovered that Wes was worse shagging flies than he was at that particular time—on the mound. So he continued as a pitcher.

Before the '34 season Wes went to Boston. He did fairly well there except for the fact that Player-Manager Joe Cronin, a very nice young Irish chap, suddenly developed a suicide complex. Everytime Cronin saw Ferrell he reached for a handy gas jet or razor. It seemed that Ferrell figured the stars, and not Cronin, were guiding his destinies. Accordingly Wes walked off to the mound during games twice in '36 and once in '37.

During the '37 season Wes was traded to Washington, along with Brother Rick, the very good catcher. His combination winning score for '37 was 14 won and 10 lost. This year he won 13 and lost eight for the Senators.

Clark Griffith of the Senators gave no specific reason why he gave Wes his unconditional release last Friday—except to say that he didn't fit in with Washington's plans for a young club. Nobody seemed to want Wes until suddenly Pitcher Joe Vance of the Yankees was stricken with appendicitis Saturday night. Then Joe McCarthy got him. The same Joe McCarthy of the Yankees, whom Wes had described as the best manager in the majors. We wonder if eccentric Wes will say the same thing at the end of the '38 season.
