P. M. ened up for her as the evening unfolded. A little smile came to her lips as she remembered how absurdly sulky he had become during the last part of the evening because she had danced so often with Dick. And now - she shook herself loose from her dreaming—she was sailing away to marry Dick, and leaving the man whom she knew she would always love. Margot handed her a tiny handkerchief sympathically and said, 'I'm sorry, dear. You mustn't cry." She eyed Sherry with concern. "Oh, it's nothing," Sherry said firmly, and then, hastily, she added, "Will you send these up to my hotel right away, please?"

to Henri's to have her hair done and to relax in the luxury of a facial and a manicure. Then, with two hours spent, she began to grow anxious for fear that she would be late.

She hurried back to her hotel and changed into her suit to go on board the ship.

After a while she called the desk and asked if any message had come for her. It was strange fused to look at the prices or to that Dick had not called. But the think about them. In an hour she hour grew later and she was fespent more on her wardrobe than verishly anxious to get on board she had spent all the rest of her the ship. A fear that it would sail without her and leave her here to face Meredith and Ardis struck her.
She tried to call Dick's apartment and after a long while suc-ceeded in getting it, only to be told by his man that he was not at home.

After a time her telephone rang sharply and sae went swiftly across the room to answer. Her voice was shaking when she answered.

It was Dick. He said in a hurried voice, "There's been a delay, Sherry. Will you call a cab and go along? Go on board and wait in your cabin, won't you, like a good

"Why, of course, Dick. Is it anything that I can help you with? "Sorry, no. See you in a little while, darling."

As she walked up the gangplank Sherry wondered what had happened to delay him. Her heavier luggage was already on board and she gave a quick glance at the lovely flowers that were in profusion in the cabin.

After today she would have no right to even picture him to herself, And brief as the short time remaine to think of him, she fiercely clung to it, steeping herself in al of his little gestures, the steadi-ness of his hand with a paint brush in it. "It's all a mistake, I know that iow. You would have made me that he might not have had anything to do with the announcement in yesterday's papers. Ardis had called in the reporters on the may be the one to spring the surevening of her return from our weekend party and gave them the information. Of course, coming from her, they didn't question the authenticity of it.

"Evidently, Meredith had quite a time getting her to see his point. He mailed his letter after Ardis had talked to the reporters. But now, finally she does see. And, dear Sherry, I see and understand everything, too.

"I wish you and Merry every happiness. You both deserve it. And I shall be happy in knowing that you have each other. Yours, "DICK."

The tears were wetting the pa per so that already it had begun to curl up at the corners. How could she have been so blind as to not have thought of this. Of course Ardis had called in the reporters! How like her it was, too. She had ruthlessly planned her own life and would ruthlessly manage everything to make t run perfectly. She was interrupted by an-other light tap at her door and thinking it was the steward again, she impatiently opened it.

Her eyes widened and a wild orilliance came into them.. Merelith stood outside, his arms opened to her. He came inside the door and pushed it gently to with his broad shoulder.

"Do we have to understand right now? Oh, Sherry, darling, it's enough to know that we're together. I'll never let you go again.

Presently, he whispered in her ear, "The captain is all ready to perform the marriage ceremony And, Sherry, darling, we mustn't disappoint the captain."
"No." She smiled at him. "If the captain can wait until the bride changes her dress, we won't lisappoint him."
