World War Film Now at Capitol

It was more than 18 years ago when the Assassin of Saejavo set civilized nations at each others' throats.

A new generation is growing into manhood and womanhood—a generation to which war is unknown.

An understanding of that experience which changed the lives of uncounted millions—an understanding which no book history can possibly give—can be gained at the Capitol theater where is showing "When Germany Fell," a photographic record of the World War.

The group not now benefiting by federal aid for vocational rehabilitation include the handicapped by heart disease, rheumatism, and other chronic disabilities which make it difficult, if not impossible, for them to carry on regular jobs in business and industry, but who, Faulkes and other experts believe, can be trained to do certain kinds of work which would enable them to become wholly or partly self-supporting.

Under a bill introduced in the last congress by Sen. La Follette (P. Wis.) and in this congress by Sen. Wiley (R., Wis.), such persons would be added to those who can be rehabilitated with federal aid.

The bill would also increase federal aid, for this purpose, and would permit use of some of the funds to pay subsistence expenses of the men and women while they are being trained.

The present program benefits chiefly those who have been injured in industry or who are otherwise crippled.

The Spanish War Veterans, Quenmeier camp No. 10, will hold their annual muster Wednesday night at 6:30 in the G. A. R. hall. Ceremonies will be preceded by a dinner served by the ladies auxiliary. Camp from Ft. Atkinson, Beloit, Janesville, Beaver Dam and other cities are expected to attend.

A fiendish fellow has been rambling around Capitol Hill asking Congressmen and senators to spell the following 10 words:

Inoculate, embarrass, harass, persuade, inuendo, rarfey, vilify, plaguy, desecate, picnicify.

So far no member has been able to spell more than five correctly. Try it on your favorite local official.

At the eleven hour the New Dealers have finally round time to do a little picking up and tidying around the Washington bureaus. It's almost as if they were expecting company in 1940.

They are picking agencies up out of basements, wastebaskets and old attics, trying to glue together old office furniture and functions come unglued, and dust off half-forgotten executives and set them all in a row.

All this reorganization now seems so obviously right that in their first moment of shock even the Republicans don't object. . . . It doesn't take a genius to see that the lending agencies (for example) should be merged; it was merely overlooked in the frenzy of salvage and reform.

Also, the New Dealers may think their new agencies won't be so vulnerable to GOP bows and arrows if they're consolidated, while the Republicans may think they'll be an easier pushover AFTER they're merged.

POTOMAC PIFLE: Washingtonians can make more delightful gardens of a backyard 25 feet wide than a midwesterner can with a quarter of a block; especially the citizens of Georgetown. . . . Young John Roosevelt, the baby of the family, is now the only one of the children untouched by divorce or rumors of divorce. Another divorce in the family would be tantamount to endorsing Taft or Dewey, and I don't think it's in the cards.

CAPITAL CAVIAR: Someone asked Ben Cohen if he would ever try to travel incognito like his alter ego, Thomas Gardner (Corcoran) by using his first two names, Benjamin Victor.

"I don't call myself Victor," said Mr. Cohen. "I call myself 'Victim.'"

When the president sent over his reorganization message last week, a GOP senator solemnly told a senate elevator boy that under it all elevator boys were to be transferred to the bureau of fisheries, which is under Harry Hopkins.

One New Deal triumph for which the GOP can't claim credit — which has lately for each New Deal act of penitence — is the baby son to be born to the secretary of the Interior and Mrs. Hal Ickes. . . . Faulkes to Address Conference

WASHINGTON—W. F. Faulkes, state supervisor of vocational rehabilitation in Wisconsin, will speak at the meeting here May 12-14 of the administrative council of the National Society for Crippled Children.

He will discuss the needs of physically handicapped persons not now included in the present program of vocational rehabilitation.

The group not now benefiting by federal aid for vocational rehabilitation include the handicapped by heart disease, rheumatism, and other chronic disabilities which make it difficult, if not impossible, for them to carry on regular jobs in business and industry, but who, Faulkes and other experts believe, can be trained to do certain kinds of work which would enable them to become wholly or partly self-supporting.
