PORTSMOUTH, N. Y., Sept. 16 Houston Oil, new -(AP)-Huddled in the slimy, dripping interior of the salvaged submarine Squalus, members of a naval board of inquiry grimly viewed a mechanical demonstration which dramatically illustrated what may have caused the craft to plunge to tragedy May 23. Only a short time after 25 of the 26 dead were removed from the rusty, battered hull yesterday, hoard members watched a navy man yank a lever designed to close two air intake valves on the sub. The smaller of the two banged shut promptly. The other-and largervalve did not budge. The aid pumped the gear, which works somewhat on the same principle as hydraulic brakes, two or three times the valve finally closed but Lt. Oliver F. Natuin, rescued commander of the $4,000,000 submersible, promptly submitted to board members a reiteration of his belief that the vital valve behaved the same way 116 days ago when the Squalus sank in 240 feet of | water, 15 miles off this port, during routine test dives.
