Whos Who Among Wisconsin Birds

EASTERN MEADOWLARK

The Meadowlark is another one of the birds that has won considerable notice from poets but the Eastern Meadowlark found in Wisconsin has another claim to fame in that it is declared "one of the most valuable birds." Its food is about 75 percent animal matter such as grasshoppers, locusts, crickets, beetles, weevils, caterpillars, ants, spiders, etc. The rest of its food is seed of injurious weeds and waste grain. It is an abundant summer resident in Wisconsin and is occasionally found in the state in winter. Its nesting range runs from southern Ontario east through Canada, to New Brunswick, south to northern Texas and North Carolina and west to eastern Minnesota, eastern Iowa, western Nebraska, Kansas and northwestern Texas. It winters regularly from the Potomac and Ohio Valleys south to the Gulf states and north locally to the Great Lakes and southern Maine. The nest is built on the ground, well concealed, usually arched over and approached by a runway, and is built of grasses. The bird walks or runs when on the ground. The male is a brilliant yellow breast with a deep black crescent on the breast, running up onto the sides of the neck. The sides are tawny-white striped. Above the bird is striped and spotted with black chestnut and dull white. It has a medium crown stripe. The outer tail-feathers are largely white, the bird's cheeks are grayish-white and the yellow is confined to the throat. A light line over the eye is yellow in front. The female is smaller; it is similar but the yellow is paler and the black on the breast is restricted or broken into spots and streaks.
