> "Four Daughters" ended with Dorothy Lamour, and the way apparently smoothed for Lynn and Priscilla to be married and live happily ever afterward. Garfield, Priscilla's first husband in a marriage that proved an unhappy mistake, got himself killed in a traffic crash.

But in "Four Wives," Priscilla is haunted by her memories of Garfield. She is obsessed by the fact that he was a failure and blames herself because a promising career was cut short. She can't rid herself of visions of Garfield as he sat at the piano and played for her one of his own compositions-a melody that had no beginning or end, just a middle.

Thus Garfield's memory is the "menace" of the story. It is perhaps the first time in film history that a vision has been the "other man" in a romantic triangle.
