It is with Ward Bond, one of the film capital's most easily recognized "heavies," that Richard Greene stages one of the most realistic and action-packed fistic battles ever shown on the screen. And take it from Bond (who had to take it from Greene), the star is an unorthodox fighter very damaging at close quarters. At close quarters. At close quarters they were, too, in the fight sequence in Darryl F. Zanuck's production of "Little Old New York." This film is a robust drama at the Quilia theatre, with Alice Faye, Fred MacMurray and Brenda Joyce sharing top honors with Greene.

Greene has been mussed up a lot in pictures and thus far has escaped the fate which places most leading men in straight drawingroom roles. In almost every picture in which he has appeared, Dick has had to run a gauntlet of fists and bullets before he got the girl.
