each year by a special procedure. Oats, wheat, or barley of hybrid origin, on the other hand, can be used for seed from year to year, say Leith and Shands Such small grains, after they are put through a process of selection and line breeding, become stabilized and from then on breed true to type. In fact, certain of the common grains of hybrid origin have been grown in this way for the past 40 years.

Leith and Shands warn emphatically against buying a small grain purely on the strength of its being a hybrid. Such procedure is likely to result in disappointment. They pointed out that a seed salesman who tries to argue that a small grain produces better because it's a "hybrid" is more or less in a class with "gold brick

Working in the laboratory at the University of Wisconsin, James Johnson has found that tobacco brown root-rot disease may be eliminated by drying the soil, freezing it for a period of weeks, and then heating it to 113 de-grees for 24 hours, or by treating Unopposed candidates on the it with certain chemicals. city-at-large ballot are S. These findings suggest that under field conditions, the soil temperature and moisture probably are important factors influencing the prevalence of brown root-rot. Johnson believes this explanation fits with the known facts that the disease affects tobacco very unevenly in the fields where it is troublesome, that it varies in severity from time to time during a season, and also varies from one season to the next. Hahn and Leonard Marten, first Likewise he is of the opinion it ward alderman; Elmer Mielke may help explain why brown root-rot is fairly common when tobacco is grown after sod, but tends to disappear after the field has been plowed and cultivated for a year or two. In the light of visor; Reuben Bare and C. W. laboratory findings, this is probably because working the soil exposes more of it to the weather. "The best known method of avoiding trouble with brown root-rot is to grow corn or some other row crop for at least one year—and preferably two or three years-following sod, before planting the land to tobacco," says Johnson. "This method also has the advantage of reducing the effects of low fertility, especially low soil nitrates, which sometimes are confused with brown root-rot."
