Alchemists Looked for Secret of Lasting Life
Through all the ages people have found that death comes to each human being. A man may die while still young, or he may live to a ripe old age. In any case death comes sooner or later. There has been worry about that problem for a long time. Seven hundred years ago, certain men in Europe were looking for a way to end death. They were searching for what they called "the philosopher's stone."

It was supposed that a single touch of the stone would give a person everlasting life on earth.

Another plan was to use the philosopher's stone to turn "base metals" into gold. It was hoped to change iron or lead into the bright yellow metal for which so many persons have shown greed. Princes, kings, and nobles supplied money to those who labored to bring about such magic. They hoped to learn a secret which would bring them far more money than they had spent.

The name of "alchemist" was given to a man who tried to make a philosopher's stone. There were scores of them in Europe during the Middle Ages. They worked in secret places. They did not want to let the public know what they discovered. They feared that they might be put to death for dealing with "black magic."

Herbs were boiled, and the juice was mixed with acids. Tests were made with quicksilver and sulphur.

More than one alchemist claimed that he had made the magic stone, but no claim was proved. Instead of obtaining great wealth, the alchemists used up much money.

The money was not entirely lost, however. The work of the alchemists led to a greater knowledge of herbs and chemicals. It did much to bring about the science of chemistry.

If a way had been found to turn iron into gold, quickly and cheaply, what would have happened to the price of gold? Gold would have become cheap, perhaps as cheap as iron.

If gold became as common as iron, people would have little use for it as money. The chief reason for its value today is the fact that it is rather "scarce."
