Today's Campfire Corner

By JACK WELCH

He was a sturdy little fellow with a big head, broad chest and short hair. Jet black, he'd have looked more like a Labrador in miniature thar anything else, if it hadn't been for his tail, which was bushy like a shepherd dog's. He had big brown eyes, but there was nothing pathetic about them. They stared balefully at you in a defiant "you mind your own business and I'll mind mine" sort of way that invited no intimacy and brooked no interference. I first spied him trotting across the corn stubble from a distant farmhouse toward the edge of the woodlot where I was looking for squirrels.

"Come here," I commanded as he approached more closely. He wasn't surprised; apparently he'd spotted me from afar and come to investigate. He sat down and regarded me suspiciously. No was of the tail or twinkle of an eye. Not even open hostility, but the gaze with which a scientist might impersonally examine a strange specimen. I called again and sauntered in his direction. He retired a little distance and resumed his survey.

"G'wan home," I ordered, in a less friendly tone. No reaction whatever, Then I hurled a piece of broken branch in his general were combing adjacent cornfields. direction. He looked at the missile, gazed at me, and yawned.
"Well, stay there then," I told clump of brush, winnowed him, proceeding on my quest for through every little patch of swale bushytails. But Blackie had no in- grass, with conscientious thortention of staying there, or of oughness. And he never got far tention of staying there, or of going home either. He proceeded out of shooting range, except once to join my lone wolf hunt, which, it soon was evident, he intended turn into a twosome.

There were squirrels in that outer, I decided, though his unrelenting activity hadn't as yet produced any game. Then I spied a gray squirrel making for a large oak some distance away, scurrying through fallen leaves, over branches and hillocks. I fired, but the bushytail kept right on going.

Camouflage Approaching more closely I sat down with my back to a stump, studying the upper branches of the oak. I couldn't discern a den hole, so I deducted that Mr. Squirrel was flattened along a limb, camouflaging. Half an hour's close scrutiny, and I spied a portion of his tail, waving slightly at intervals in the fretful breeze. Blackie apparently had at last departed on some quest of his own, or I was so intent on the squirrel that I didn't notice him. The second shot gropped the squirrel, a plump sleek one. I could see. But no sooner had it hit the ground than out rushed a black streak to grab it.

"Drop it!" I commanded sharply. Blackie, squirrel in his mouth deigned to turn and stare blankly. 'Drop it or I'll shoot," I yelled, and for once pointed a gun at something I didn't intend to kill. Blackie (was it with a slight gesture of contempt?) turned and loped away in the direction whence he had first appeared. would dismiss the little pirate's he was watching the squirrel, too, all the time, and merely pilfered it with the intention of burying it or eating it as his leisure.

As for me, I'm convinced he'd trained himself, or perhaps been trained, to join a hunting party, pick up the first game shot, and
