Paul Muni Stars in Millay's 'The Murder of Lidice'

Uncle Ray's Corner

SOMEWHAT more than three centuries ago, Virginia Indians obtained a small supply of gunpowder from the English settlement of Jamestown. Taking it to one of their villages, we are told, they planted it in the ground and waited for it to grow—so they would have a larger amount!

If that story is true, the Indians had a long wait. Many wonders have sprung from the world of science, but so far, at least, no fertile seed has been produced in the laboratory. Yet Nature knew how to make seeds vast ages ago.

Most kinds of plants (but not all) grow from seeds. Let a seed be buried in the proper soil, and in due time it will sprout and take root.

The seed has two "poles." One of these tends to grow upward to make the parts of the plant we commonly see. The other "pole" tends to grow downward.

The part which goes downward has a main part, called the "tap root," and this part is likely to branch. In their turn, the branches often divide into new branches. In the end there comes a network of roots.

Some small plants have very small roots, filling a space of less than one cubic inch. Other plants have roots which reach far and wide under the soil.

A sunflower plant may have a widespread root system. A large one may have a root system covering a cubic yard of space under the ground!

The tap root tends to grow downward, but one thing or another may change its course. A stone in the way may cause the root to move sideways, but after getting past the stone, it is likely to go downward again. Branches of the taproot often spread out sideways.

The roots are after water and mineral food. The larger they spread, the more likely they are to give a good enough supply to the plant above.

Millions of housewives have plants in flower pots. An odd little event has been known to take place in a flower pot. Mushroom spores, floating through the air, find their way into soil later placed in the pots. Growing out of sight, mushrooms at length become so large that they push a short-rooted plant out of a flower pot!

Oh, what manners!

Uncle Ray
